Extension of law providing for stock-raising homesteads.

Relief to certain land entrymen, through leave of absence from their claims, to enable them to engage in essential industries.

Relief from assessment work on mining claims to avoid the withdrawal of labor from essential industries.

Provision for grants of public lands for school purposes.

Provision for completion and payment of necessary construction work on Army camps and cantonments.

Provision in aid of relief for the stricken peoples of the Near East by providing for an organization for that purpose.

Provision for the further regulation of vessels operated by the Shipping Board.

Extension of the provisions of law for the protection of the civil rights of the members of the Military and Naval Establishments.

Creation of office of General of the Armies of the United States in terms providing for the appointment of John J. Pershing to that office.

Granting citizenship to Indians who fought in the World War.

Authorizing the Protestant Episcopal Church of the diocese of Washington to give the same right to women to vote and hold office as is now enjoyed by men.

Provision for tentage for encampments of the Grand Army of the Republic, United Confederate Veterans, Spanish War Veterans, and Veterans of the World War.

Granting the cancellation-stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association.

Extending the franking privilege to Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of ex-President Roosevelt.

Provision for an ambassador to Belgium.

Provision for the regulation of rents in the District of Columbia.

GENERAL LEGISLATION OF SECOND SESSION, SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

The volume of general legislation enacted during the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress is so great that I shall not attempt to refer even by title to all of the large number of bills which became laws. I shall refer only to the more important measures, measures a number of which are epoch making, measures far out of the ordinary, and stamping the work of the Congress as of a character which will make it historic. Among these are:

The railway transportation act. (Public, No. 152.)

The legislation for a national budget. (Veto, H. R. 9783.)

Reform of the rules of the House and Senate in the consolidation of committees as a part of the program of budget reform. (H. Res. 324.)

The merchant marine shipping act. (Public, No. 261.)

The oil and coal land leasing law. (Public, No. 146.)

The water-power act. (H. R. 3184.)

Act for the vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry. (Public, No. 236.)

The civil service retirement act. (Public, No. 215.)

The act establishing a Woman's Bureau in the Department of Labor. (Public, No. 259.)

The peace resolution. (Veto, H. J. Res. 327.)

The act for the repeal of the war laws. (Pocket veto, H. J. Res. 373.)

The act reclassifying and readjusting the salaries of postal employees. (Public, No. 265.)

The act increasing pensions to veterans of the Civil and Mexican Wars. (Public, No. 190.)

The act increasing pensions to veterans of the Spanish-American War and Philippine insurrection. (Public, No. 256.)

The act to exclude and expel anarchistic aliens. (Public, No. 262.)

The act increasing the efficiency and pay of commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service. (Public, No. 210.)

The act for examination and report on irrigation development of the Imperial Valley, Calif. (Public, No. 208.)

The act authorizing the United States Grain Corporation to provide relief to populations in Europe and the Near East by furnishing flour valued at $50,000,000. (Public, No. 167.)

The act authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer surplus motor-propelled vehicles, motor equipment, and road-making material to departments of the Government and to the States. (Public, No. 159.)

The act providing for furnishing water supply for miscellaneous purposes in connection with reclamation projects. (Public, No. 147.)

Amendment of Federal reserve act providing for corporations authorized to do foreign banking business. (Public, No. 106.)

The Sweet Act amending the war-risk insurance act, increasing the efficiency of the bureau and greatly liberalizing the provisions of the act in the payment of compensation to disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. (Public, No. 104.)

Resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission to confer with the Governments of the Dominion and certain Provinces of Canada with a view of securing cancellation of restriction on the exportation of pulp wood, with a view of reducing the price of print paper. (Pocket veto.)

The act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase certain Federal farm loan bonds. (Public resolution, No. 45.)

THE RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION BILL.

At the beginning of its special session the Sixty-sixth Congress was confronted with the great problem of unscrambling the railroads of the country, of restoring them after 26 months of Government control to private management under Government supervision. The questions involved and the problems presented were among the most difficult and important a legislative body has ever been confronted with. These questions and problems were faced courageously, and it is believed were solved wisely and in the interest of the entire people. If the Sixty-sixth Congress had enacted no other piece of constructive legislation the enactment of this one measure would have entitled it to the favorable consideration of the country. The wide difference of opinion existing relative to the questions at issue were so harmonized and adjusted as to commend the legislation to the judgment of fair-minded men among the employees, the owners, the individuals, and institutions interested in the stability of railway enterprises, and the great public these systems were created to serve.

THE SWEET ACT, INCREASING COMPENSATION OF DISABLED VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR.

Among the more important legislation of the Congress is the so-called Sweet Act, amending the war-risk insurance act for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the War Risk Bureau and greatly liberalizing the provisions of the war-risk act in payment of compensation to disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. The compensation features of the war-risk act were considered quite liberal at the time that act became a law, but with the passage of time it became quite evident that the provisions made for incapacitated soldiers for their compensation, for their hospital treatment, and for their maintenance during vocational training was not sufficient to meet the desire of the country to provide liberally for its disabled defenders.

The act in question, as well as other legislation of the same character, and the large appropriations for this purpose, to which reference has been made, was the result. The United States stands at the forefront of the nations as being the most liberal of any in its provisions for compensation, insurance, hospital treatment, and vocational training of its soldiers, sailors, and marines, and in caring for the dependents of those who lost their lives in the Great War.

THE COAL AND OIL LAND LEASING BILL.

It is more than a decade since forward-looking men began an agitation for the retention in public ownership of title to lands containing oil and coal and other essential minerals with a view of preserving control over them in the interest of the general public. Bills having that object in view were introduced and considered ten or twelve years ago, and for the last eight years Congress has had measures of that character under consideration practically every session, and on several occasions legislation of this character has passed one House or the other. In the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress a coal and oil land leasing bill reached the stage of conference. During all this period, however, it was impossible to reconcile conflicting opinions. Four Democratic Congresses failed to secure satisfactory legislation, any legislation at all, in fact, and it remained for the Republican Congress to perfect the legislation and secure its passage. The bill as it became a law still contains some of the defects inherent in the faulty original drafting at the beginning of the Wilson administration, but as it was placed upon the statute books it is far and away a better measure than any of its predecessors, and will prove satisfactorily workable under wise administration.

The passage of this bill stamps the work of the Republican Sixty-sixth Congress as being of a wisely practical character, as being progressively and constructively responsive to the best opinion of the times. Republican administrations under Roosevelt and Taft laid the foundations for this legislation and urged its enactment, and after eight years of Democratic failure to secure the legislation a Republican Congress places upon the statute books the legislation which had its genesis in former Republican administrations.

The oil and coal land leasing act not only safeguards the general public interest in these fuel and power resources; it not only promises a large increase, with a consequent reduction of prices, in the supply of gasoline, but is of particular interest to the great West, whose national reclamation fund will be greatly enriched and enlarged by the income from the rents and royalties. More than $5,000,000 of royalties collected in anticipation of this legislation is now on hand and will be available within the next few months for expenditure under the national reclamation act for the irrigation and development of arid and semiarid lands. While it is impossible at this time to accurately estimate the annual income from these sources for irrigation development through and under the national reclamation law, it may be safely and conservatively stated that it will amount to several millions of dollars annually, and eventually to tens of millions. As the Republican Party placed upon the statute books the national reclamation law, it has, through the enactment of the oil and coal land leasing act, provided a fund which will supplement and take the place of the diminishing resources to the fund from the sale of public lands and insure the continuation and permanence of this great work of national development. Western States having these resources will also find their State revenues much increased and their school and road funds greatly benefited by the share they will receive of the receipts. No legislation of recent years is of more far-reaching beneficial character than this.

THE WATER-POWER BILL.

When the water-power bill was signed another one of the great constructive measures which had their genesis in the constructive, progressive republicanism of the days of Roosevelt and Taft became a law. We appreciate the efforts of our Democratic friends during nearly eight years of administration to agree upon and enact this legislation. In its continued consideration during almost the entire period of Mr. Wilson's administration the Democratic Congresses indicated their appreciation of the wisdom of the policies and purposes of former Republican administrations and Congresses, but they failed to secure results, and it became our duty and our privilege to complete in a Republican Congress the work that former Republican administrations had advised and advanced.

One must have a lively imagination to fully grasp the far-reaching effect of the water-power legislation. But this we know, that it realizes the dream and hope and purpose of men who have given great study to the question of the development of hydroelectric energy from water power, and if it shall prove as useful and helpful in the development of the Nation's water resources as even the most moderate of its sponsors expect, it will prove to be one of the real epoch-making enactments of legislation. Its passage is one of the notable achievements of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

THE BUDGET.

So many others have discussed the budget at length and in detail that I shall make only brief reference to it. No one knows and no one can tell just how well the budget system that has been worked out will operate. This we do know, and can say with assurance, that from the beginning of our Government and up to this time we have never had a businesslike system for the forecast of revenues; for the determination and presentation of estimates; for the balance of income with outgo. We have never had a system that even attempted to adjust the proposed appropriation garment to the anticipated or expected cloth of income. Until we do have a system which, at least, attempts something of that sort we can not hope to have economical or businesslike methods in government.

The budget proposes such a system of government efficiency, and proposes it in a form which has the commendation of all of those friends of good government who have given the matter most consideration. The enactment of budget legislation constitutes conclusive evidence of the determination of the Republican Congress to establish the best possible conditions in the public service. It is a triumph of wise, intelligent, constructive legislation. It is the fruition of the hope of the most intelligent and disinterested workers in the field of national efficiency and economy.

But the budget met a presidential veto—met it because the Chief Executive, who also pocket vetoed the resolution taking from him many of his extraordinary and autocratic war powers—allowed this great governmental reform to fail because it contained a provision under which there were two officials whose duty it was to be to audit and examine the expenditures of the departments over whom he would not have the power of removal. Every student of budgetary legislation agrees that an essential to economy and efficiency in governmental expenditure and service is an independent audit and examination of expenditures and operations, and that there can be no such independent audit if the head of the administration, whose expenditures and operations are to be examined, has the power of official life and death over those responsible for such audit and examination. But the President, clinging to every thread and vestige of authority, declined to approve legislation which would insure unhampered and uninfluenced examination of public affairs.

So disinterestedly anxious was the Congress to inaugurate this great reform, to substitute responsibility and efficiency for extravagance and inefficiency, that rather than allow the budget to fail the House agreed to give the President the power to remove the very officers who were to audit and examine the administration's affairs, and thus amended passed the bill, but in the Senate in the closing hours a single Democratic Senator blocked the way and rendered the enactment of the legislation impossible. Thus, for the time being, this great reform is halted by action of the President and his party, but the Republican Party is pledged to it, and if we can not secure it under the present President in the coming session we shall obtain it under a Republican President in the new Congress.

REFORM OF THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

To make budgetary legislation effective there must be a concentration and coordination of responsibility over appropriations in the legislative body responsible for expenditures. In order to secure such responsibility and coordination it was necessary to amend the rules of the House of Representatives and take from seven important committees now reporting appropriation bills their authority and jurisdiction in that regard and place the authority and responsibility in a single committee. In order to accomplish this it became necessary for many Members of the House to take the self-sacrificing position of voluntarily relinquishing power and influence they now possess. The distinguished minority leader, Mr. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, said it could not and would not be done; but he failed to realize the self-denying temper and the determination of this Republican Congress in the fulfillment of its pledges and in the establishment of economy and efficiency. Though the budget failed, the reform of the rules of the House stands; though the President defeated reform as applied to the jurisdiction of the Executive, the House of Representatives reformed its appropriating legislative procedure.

THE CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT BILL.

For many years public sentiment has been strengthening in the direction of approval of a bill for the retirement of the civil-service employees of the Government. The principle of retirement has been growing in favor among intelligent employers of all classes, and this sentiment on behalf of the principle has been reflected in the Congress. While there was some difference of opinion on the subject, the retirement bill received the support of a great majority of Members, and it is believed by all those who have given the matter most careful study and consideration to be a well-considered and entirely defensible piece of legislation.

The enactment of the civil-service retirement law is another evidence of the constructive, progressive spirit of the Congress. It will bring comfort and relief and peace of mind to many worthy public servants who have reached, and are soon to reach, the age of retirement. It is also believed that it will tend greatly to improve the efficiency of the public service and will in the long run prove to be a measure not only of mercy and of justice but of practical economy as well.

THE ARMY REORGANIZATION ACT.

The Great War found us unprepared, and at its close it became necessary to attempt not only to lay broader and better foundations for the permanent national defense but to recognize and provide for the changes in the instrumentalities and methods of warfare which the war had developed, and to adopt as a permanent policy changes in military organization and practice, the necessity and advisability of which the war had demonstrated. Hence the necessity for an Army reorganization act. Heretofore a Congress would have been notable if it had accomplished nothing more out of the ordinary and routine than the reorganization of the Military Establishment; but this great work has been but one of the constructive legislative programs of the Congress, and its accomplishment in addition to all the other important work of the Congress is an evidence of the fidelity, the industry, and the efficiency with which the Congress has addressed itself to the problems before it.

THE MERCHANT MARINE AND SHIPPING ACT.

We went into the Great War with the smallest high-seas shipping fleet possessed by any first-class nation. We came out of the war having spent and assumed obligations totaling more than $3,500,000,000 and with a merchant fleet second only to that of Great Britain. No more trying problem has ever been presented to a legislative body than that presented to this Congress in the matter of making provisions for this great fleet, for the protection of the public interest in our enormous investment, and in the establishment of a permanent shipping policy.

In view of the wide differences of opinion which have heretofore prevailed among our people touching these matters we might well have been skeptical and pessimistic of the possibility of settling and adjusting differences and securing an agreement on merchant marine and shipping legislation, and yet it was accomplished in a period of less than a year from the time it was undertaken. And thus this great constructive measure—the Greene-Jones merchant marine and shipping bill—the first comprehensive, constructive legislative program for a merchant fleet since the Civil War, became one of the notable accomplishments of the session of Congress just closed.

THE RESOLUTION FOR THE REPEAL OF THE WAR LAWS.

The President having prevented the ratification of the treaty of Versailles by insisting that there should be no reservations insuring American independence and sovereignty, and the right of the American Congress to declare war, and the President having further prevented the establishment of conditions of peace, the restoration of normal relationships with our late enemies, and the fixing of the date of the repeal of the war laws by the veto of the peace resolution, it became necessary for the Congress, by resolution, to attempt to restore normal conditions of legislation, declaring that the date of the approval of the resolution should be considered as equivalent to the date of the establishment of peace or of the declaration of a state of peace in affecting the repeal of the war laws.

The Congress, mindful however of the benefits possible to be obtained through the enforcement of the Lever Act, expressly reserved that act and certain other enumerated acts from the effect of the general repeal. The provisions of this resolution must have been, at least should have been, known to the President for some time, for the body of the resolution was similar to a section of the peace resolution, and the exceptions to the repealing effect of the resolution had, I am confident, the approval of the administration.

The resolution reached the President at 2.32 p. m. June 5. The 10 days, which it is now held the President has in which to sign, has elapsed, and so far no word has come from within the mysterious recesses of the White House relative to the resolution. We must, therefore, assume that it has been ignored—pocket vetoed. And thus by the pocket-vetoing, without a word of explanation or excuse, of a resolution passed by the almost unanimous vote of the House and Senate, repealing the war laws, except those under which the administration ought to, but does not, punish profiteering and the law under which the President regulates trading with Germany and Austria, the President retains for another six months all the vast autocratic powers conferred upon him freely by the Congress for the purpose of winning the war.

History has no parallel for this procedure. Monarchs have lost their thrones—and their heads—for less definite, conspicuous, and effective thwarting of the public will as expressed by the people's representatives. History records no case where an Executive acting under a Constitution has so defiantly, so tenaciously, clung to power conferred to meet an emergency when the emergency had passed and the people's representatives had willed a return to normal conditions. Only the uncompromising autocrats of history furnish a parallel.

I note that in a statement from the White House, dated Friday, June 18, mostly reiterating his attitude on the League of Nations, the President, apropos of nothing in particular, stated "Republican leaders in Congress cried aloud for the repeal of some of the measures which they well knew protected the people from more serious evils than they would have the country know," and following this cryptic utterance the President proceeds to refer to the Lever Food Control Act and to suggest that the "time for repealing it is not yet." Just what this all means no one but the President can know, for no one, so far as I know, has proposed a repeal of the Lever Act. That act is, as I have stated, expressly excepted from the provisions of the repeal resolution, and yet, if this statement from the President was not intended to mislead people into believing that Congress had attempted to repeal the Lever Act, it could have had no intelligent or understandable purpose. No; we did not want to repeal the Lever Act, although it is true that the administration has utterly, deplorably, pitiably failed to enforce it, and give the people the relief from extortion, profiteering, and consequent high prices which that act was intended to give. While the President clings with more than the tenacity of a reactionary ruler of the Old World to every shred and vestige of the extraordinary powers granted him during the war, his administration has failed utterly to give to the American people the benefits which it was hoped and claimed the exercise of this great power would afford.

AID FOR THOSE DISABLED IN INDUSTRY.

No act of the recent session of Congress so clearly and definitely proclaims the Congress as progressive, constructive, and forward looking in its policy and program as the act "to provide for the promotion of the vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry and for their return to civil employment." The act provides for Federal cooperation with the States in this worthy purpose and appropriates the sum of $750,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and the sum of $1,000,000 annually thereafter, in addition to appropriations amounting to upward of $100,000 annually for administrative and like purposes. For many years leaders in philanthropy, charity, in welfare work, in labor, and in business have been challenging the attention of the country to the duty of caring for and restoring to lives of usefulness the thousands who are annually incapacitated by accidents in the industries and in agriculture, and reduced to a crippled and more or less helpless condition. A number of the States have responded to appeals of this kind and have made provision for the vocational training and rehabilitation of such unfortunates, with a view of enabling them to become self-supporting and thus live self-respecting lives. The call has come for the Federal Government to aid in this work; to give it encouragement and direction; and the legislation referred to is the result. Its enactment is the best proof that could have been given that the Congress that has just adjourned is alive to and abreast of the progressive, constructive spirit of the times.

THE WOMAN'S BUREAU.

The Great War brought the establishment in the Department of Labor of a small organization devoted to the interests of women in industry. It was one of the few of the new activities of the Department of Labor that were really intelligently, conscientiously, and usefully managed. The appropriation for this purpose was continued in the sundry civil bill for the current fiscal year, and now the Congress has placed upon the statute books an act which confers upon this work the dignity of a bureau and assures its permanency and extension. In the legislation in question Congress recognizes the peculiar problems surrounding women engaged in industrial and gainful pursuits and makes provision which it is believed will be helpful and useful in a marked and notable degree.

BANKING CORPORATIONS TO PROMOTE FOREIGN BUSINESS.

With the return of normal conditions in the world we shall be required to meet the liveliest competition in the maintenance and extension of our foreign trade. The readjustments of trade and commerce following the war are rapidly taking place, and we shall not only be required to be up and doing to extend our trade but we shall find it difficult to retain what we already have unless we avail ourselves of the very best possible facilities and equipment. With a view of meeting these conditions Congress enacted the so-called Edge bill, providing banking corporations authorized to do a foreign banking business. This legislation meets a long-felt need in connection with our foreign commerce and will undoubtedly prove to be one of the important legislative enactments of the Congress.

ACT TO EXCLUDE AND EXPEL ANARCHISTIC ALIENS.

Those who are not of our citizenship are among us on sufferance; they are, in a way, the Nation's guests. It is bad enough to have citizens teaching questionable doctrines, preaching violence, belittling our Government and institutions, stirring up trouble; such action on the part of one who is merely here as a sojourner or by our good will is intolerable. The alien who does not approve of our system of government and who preaches his disapproval and encourages resistance to it should be promptly deported. He is a guest who has violated every rule that should govern the acts of sojourners in a foreign land.

The enactment of this legislation will, it is hoped, put an end to the combination of farce, comedy, and tragedy that has characterized the activities of the administration in handling dangerous, objectionable, and criminal aliens since the war began and down to this time. It has been a most amazing combination of petty, persistent, and pestiferous persecution on the one hand and of aimless, spineless, purposeless pettifogging and inaction on the other. While certain departments of the Government have been in many cases overzealous, inefficient, and unintelligent in the handling and manufacture of cases, certain other departments, especially the Department of Labor, and particularly certain officials of that department, have apparently used their appropriations and their authority largely for the purpose of shielding some of the most notorious of the alien anarchists and in rendering abortive the efforts which are made to enforce the law and to protect the country.

ACT AUTHORIZING PURCHASE BY TREASURY OF FARM LOAN BONDS.

The abnormal conditions of the money market and the prevailing high rates of interest have rendered it temporarily impossible for the Farm Loan Board to dispose of its bonds. With a view of remedying this situation and enabling the farm loan banks to make loans that are pending and have been approved, provision was made for the purchase of such bonds by the Treasury. It is hoped and believed this action will afford greatly needed relief.

GENERAL LEGISLATION.

It is impossible, in the course of a statement like this, to refer at length to many measures of importance which were considered and enacted by the Congress, though many which I have not referred to are worthy of extended and special mention.

With a view of relieving distress among the populations of eastern Europe and adjacent regions the United States Grain Corporation was authorized to dispose of 5,000,000 barrels of flour, of an estimated value of $50,000,000, on such terms and conditions as would accomplish the objects and purposes sought.

With a view of increasing the efficiency of the Army and Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service, provision was made for increased compensation for the enlisted personnel of those services and for the commissioned personnel of the lower grades.

With a view of affording a settlement of the great problems of reclamation and development which are presented by the conditions in the Imperial Valley and the surrounding region in southern California, provision was made for an investigation of the situation with a view of entering upon a program which will afford and provide the solution of the problems presented and the complete development of this great region.

With a view of reducing, if possible, the price of print paper a resolution was adopted by the House and Senate authorizing the appointment of a commission to confer with the Governments of the Dominion and certain Provinces of Canada with a view of securing the removal of restrictions on the exportation of pulp wood. We have not heard from this important resolution since it went to the White House in the closing days of the session; it may or may not have met with Executive approval; nobody seems to know. All of which is an illuminating illustration of the ways of the Chief Executive.

TOTAL VOLUME OF WORK.

The total volume of the work of the Congress may perhaps be realized when it is stated that during the two sessions over 15,000 bills were introduced. Of these 280 became laws, as compared with 243 in the corresponding sessions of the Sixty-fifth, or war Congress. Eight hundred and fifty-eight reports were made from committees, as compared with 618 reports in the like sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress. Not only has the business of the Congress been voluminous, but it has been more important in the legislative matters considered and passed upon than any Congress since the Civil War. The preceding Congress during the Great War made larger appropriations, but they were necessarily made without the usual detail of examination. That Congress passed much legislation, but it was necessarily largely of a temporary emergency character, and therefore did not require the careful consideration which permanent, constructive legislation such as this Congress has handled requires.

I append to and make part of my remarks a statistical recapitulation and comparison of the first and second sessions of the Sixty-sixth with the corresponding sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress, as follows:

THE INVESTIGATIONS OF THE CONGRESS.

The Congress has during the two sessions carried on certain investigations of war expenditure on which quite voluminous reports had been made. As I stated at the beginning of the Congress, the investigations were undertaken not for the purpose of attempting to reflect on the character of anyone or for the primary purpose of uncovering fraud but rather with a view of making such examinations of the vast expenditures of the war as the American people are entitled to have made. When we take into consideration the enormous expenditure, the almost numberless operations and contracts, the stupendous character of anything like a complete investigation becomes apparent, and the Congress has not been disposed to spend the large sums of money or to give the time or attention that would be necessary to a thorough and complete audit of all or even a considerable portion of the operations and expenditures.

Enough has been done, however, sufficient examinations have been made, with the very modest sums that have been expended, to prove the almost unbelievable extravagance and wastefulness of the expenditures during the war; the total lack of intelligent and coordinated effort, and the pitiable results from the expenditures in many lines. Out of the expenditures of approximately a billion dollars for aeroplanes we did not obtain a single effective fighting plane on the battle front up to the time of the signing of the armistice. Out of hundreds of millions of expenditure for ordnance, we were, to the very last, dependent wholly upon the Allies for our artillery on the fighting front. Out of a hundred million dollars of expenditure in powder plants, we obtained no powder and had nothing to show but great plants built without regard to cost and of exceedingly questionable value. Out of the recklessly extravagant expenditure on shipyards and shipping we shall have a loss of at least a billion dollars.

Turn where you will, search where you may, examine any or all of the undertakings, large or small, and with a comparatively few notable exceptions the record is one of waste and inefficiency.

Nor is the fault difficult to locate, as the primary responsibility was upon the President, so the failure to function efficiently, to coordinate effectively, to make expenditures wisely and with even reasonable economy is traceable to the Chief Executive and through him to the men whom he appointed to conduct the business of the Government. Those who are familiar with the facts know that not only was there inefficiency and incapacity in the heads and among the responsible officials of the departments but that it was utterly impossible to secure through the Chief Executive anything like teamwork or coordination of efforts between the departments.

PEOPLE DID THEIR PART WELL.

The American people did their part marvelously well; the courage and efficiency of the fighting forces was phenomenal; the influence coming from the body of the people and the aid they furnished in every way to the winning of the war was praiseworthy in the highest degree. Volunteers from every walk of life gave their time, their ability, and their money in helping to win the war. Everybody did well but the Government, and the Government simply miserably muddled through.

The Nation is so rich, its people so patriotic, resourceful, and efficient that we won the war not because of administration efficiency but in spite of it, and the investigations that have been thus far made, the information secured through the examination of officials in connection with legislation and appropriation, all prove this so fully and definitely as to make it clear beyond question to anyone who has taken the trouble to keep an open mind and to become informed.

"Didn't we win the war?" say our Democratic friends. "Yes; we won the war—thanks not to the administration but to the valor and patriotism of the American people we won it in spite of official muddling."

This Republican Congress has been engaged in the business of curtailing expenditures, compelling, so far as possible, economy and efficiency in the public service and working out the problems of restoration and constructive progress. It has performed a great and notable work, the effect of which is already apparent in Government service, in spite of official indifference and interference. The beneficial effect of the Congress is reflected in the condition of the Treasury, in the expectations of early relief from excessive tax burdens, and in the assurance of an early return to efficient performance of governmental functions and the intelligent pursuit of wise and progressive policies under Republican control.

GENERAL SURVEY OF THE WORK OF THE CONGRESS.

I close, as I began, in declaring the splendid character of the work of the Congress. Having thus reviewed in some detail the more important work of the Congress, I speak with even more confidence than when my opinion expressed at the beginning of this statement was based upon my recollection of the work of the Congress as it had progressed rather than, as now, upon a review of the results. I can say without boasting and without reflecting upon the work of any former Congress that never in the same length of time has a legislative body effected so large and carefully considered economies; never has a legislative body operating for a like period enacted a greater, if as great, a volume of important constructive legislation.

Without rhyme or reason or regard to the truth the publicity organization of the Democratic national committee started and planned at the very beginning of the first session a persistent campaign of misrepresentation and belittling of the work of the Congress. That policy has been continued and persisted in apparently on the theory that a lie adhered to and frequently repeated may be accepted as the truth. As the answer to persistent misrepresentation from that and other quarters stands the record of the Congress. I submit it to the candid consideration of any honest, unprejudiced person with the assurance that the verdict will be abundantly favorable.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETER F. TAGUE,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, as a sincere proponent of the cause of Irish independence, I am very much disappointed in not being able to vote for a measure sympathetic to that cause before Congress adjourns. For about one year the people of the United States have been waiting for Congress to act on the so-called Mason bill, H. R. 3404. Hearings were held on December 12 and 13 last and the most eloquent and sincere advocates and opponents of Irish independence addressed the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Every phase of the bill was discussed, its every possibility gone into, and the numerous precedents for such action by this Congress advanced. In my statement before the committee I cited one precedent of importance:

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION, ON H. R. 3404, DECEMBER 12 AND 13, 1919.

REMARKS BY HON. P. F. TAGUE, A MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I take advantage of the opportunity extended to me by the committee to reiterate my position relative to any resolution looking to the betterment of the living conditions of the people of Ireland, and in particular to place myself on record as being in hearty accord with the proposition of the United States recognizing the de facto government of Ireland as provided for in the Mason resolution.

Despite the extensive circulation by the enemies of Irishmen—not enemies of Irish home rule, as they would have you believe—I do not believe that the fear that the passage of this resolution will involve us in any difficulties with England has gained much foothold among the members of this committee. However, there may be some members of the committee who are cautious about taking what they may believe to be an unprecedented step. To their attention I would respectfully call one incident in the history of this Republic when conditions were practically the same as exist to-day in Ireland.

I would refer you back, gentlemen, to the days of the French revolution, when an effort was being made to establish the Republic of France. The question of recognizing the ambassador of that newly born Republic arose, and Daniel Webster is quoted as saying: "From President Washington's time down to the present day it has been a principle always acknowledged by the United States, that every nation possesses the right to govern itself according to its own will, to change institutions at discretion, and to transact its business through whatever agents it may think proper to employ. This cardinal point in our policy has been strongly illustrated by recognizing the many forms of political power which have been successively adopted by France in the series of revolutions with which that country has been visited. Throughout all these changes the Government of the United States has conducted itself in strict conformity to the original principles adopted by Washington, and made known to our diplomatic agents abroad, and to the nations of the world, by Mr. Jefferson's letter to Gouverneur Morris, of the 12th March, 1793; and if the French people have now substantially made another change, we have no choice but to acknowledge that also." (Moore's Digest, vol. 1, p. 126.)

Are we to-day better Americans than was Daniel Webster? Would you accuse Webster of trying to embroil his beloved country in a passage with any other foreign power? No one has yet accused Daniel Webster of treason, and he, one of our greatest patriots, has acceded to the provisions of the Mason resolution in his remarks as I have quoted them. To-day he would say, were he here, "And if the Irish people have now substantially made another change, we have no choice but to acknowledge it."

I need not go into the present conditions in Ireland at great length. That has been ably done by the preceding speakers, Judge Cohalan and Mr. Cockran. They have told you of the courts established in Ireland, of the peaceable acceptance of the authority of these courts by the people, of the Irish Parliament, of the executive departments established, of the plans to collect taxes for the expenses of this Government, and of many other instances of the determination of the Irish people to throw off the same yoke we rejected in 1776. There is in Ireland to-day none of the civil warfare that France saw in the dark days of Louis Napoleon, no clashes between the people and the military forces. It was in the midst of such proceedings in France that our Government recognized the French Republic, and are we now to say that this resolution calls for action without precedent in the pages of American history?

Gentlemen, in conclusion, may I suggest that you give this bill, now before you, your most earnest consideration and while so doing keep before you the picture of the hopeless days of Valley Forge and Bunker Hill. Remember the principes upon which this Government was founded, and deny not to any other nation or peoples the same right. Finally, remember that these Irishmen ask your help in repudiating the same taxation without representation that our forefathers fought and died for in the early days of America, the pioneer of republics. Mr. Chairman, I thank you.

Both sides of this question were heard by the committee, and it can not be said that ample opportunity was not given the opponents of Irish independence to tell their stories. Five months have passed since those hearings were held, and now the closing days of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress see no action taken on the Mason bill by either the House or Senate. As an example of procrastination that record is without parallel in my legislative experience.

A few days ago the House Committee on Foreign Affairs reported favorably the following concurrent resolution as a substitute for the Mason bill:

Whereas the American people have always sympathized with the aspirations of every people seeking political freedom; and
Whereas the people of Ireland have shown unmistakably their desire to govern themselves; and
Whereas the conditions in Ireland to-day consequent upon the denial of that right endanger world peace; and
Whereas in particular the unrest caused by these conditions is inevitably reflected in these United States of America, tending to weaken the bonds of unity and the ancient ties of kinship which bind so many of our people to the people of Great Britain and Ireland: Therefore, in the interest of world peace and of international good will, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the House of Representatives views with concern and solicitude these conditions and expresses its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice.

Every promise was made to those of us interested that this bill would be taken up for consideration in the House before Congress adjourned, but the action of a small group of women in invading the galleries and floor of the House has been seized upon by the opponents of the Mason bill as sufficient reason for further delaying that important matter. The acts of this nonrepresentative body of women should be no reason for condemning a movement and desire of 20,000,000 of American citizens of Irish blood to free the peoples of their native land from the oppression of British autocracy. To my mind that is but an excuse. I am keenly disappointed that the promises made so often and so long ago can not be lived up to now. My heart is and always has been truly in favor of Irish independence, charges of my political opponents to the contrary notwithstanding, and I had hoped to be able to see a resolution sympathetic to the Irish cause passed by this Congress.

Some time ago—on April 14, to be exact—I introduced the following resolution into Congress:

House resolution 520.

Whereas a considerable number of citizens of Ireland have been subject to arrest and confined in prison institutions without being arraigned or placed on trial for any specific offense; and
Whereas the arrests of the aforesaid citizens of Ireland are based on allegations of committing acts of a political nature, directly or indirectly connected with a purpose to establish freedom and independence as a nation by the people of Ireland; and
Whereas it is an accepted principle of the law of nations that persons arrested as political offenders shall not be subject to the methods of confinement and treatment accorded those arrested for felonies; and
Whereas it is disclosed to the world that the lives of the persons arrested as aforesaid are being endangered by reason of the failure of officials representing the Government of Great Britain to arraign the imprisoned persons on any charge, grant them trial, or otherwise definitely accord judicial determination of the causes of arrest and continued imprisonment; and
Whereas the aforesaid persons arrested are as of inalienable right entitled to arraignment and trial, and, pending arraignment and trial, to be accorded that treatment which the principles of the law of nations accord to those arrested for political crimes, as distinguished from felonies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives does hereby request the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President, to cause representation to be made to the Government of Great Britain that the aforesaid prisoners should immediately be arraigned, placed on trial, and their cases definitely disposed of by judicial process of law, or given liberty; and if to be further held with stated purpose to accord them trial they be not further subjected to methods of confinement other than those recognized by the law of nations to be applicable to acts of a political nature.

Some criticism has been directed at this resolution and at a cablegram subsequently, on May 4, sent to Premier Lloyd-George, signed by 88 Members of the House and reading as follows:

Hon. DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE,
Premier, Parliament of Great Britain:

With the profound conviction that further wars and acts of war should be avoided, and believing that wholesale arrests without arraignment or trial disturb the peace and tranquillity of a people, are destructive of human rights, and are at variance with that principle of liberty which is embodied in the United States Constitution in the provision that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," the undersigned Members of Congress of the United States of America protest against further imprisonment, without arraignment or trial, of persons resident in Ireland arrested for acts of a political nature; and we ask in the spirit of American freedom and love of justice, out of our friendliness to the peoples of England and Ireland and in the name of international peace, that hereafter, if arrests based upon acts of a political nature are made in Ireland, by color of any form of authority, the right of trial shall without unreasonable delay be accorded to the accused.

It was charged that the resolution and cablegram were "ill-advised," in that "the British Government had no right to arrest Irish citizens, much less bring them to trial." The source of this criticism is known to me, and I have not paid much attention to it; but for fear that others as deeply interested as I am in the Irish cause may not have read further about the so-called Tague resolution, I desire to insert in the RECORD indorsements

I have received and favorable comments on the resolution which have appeared in recognized publications:

FRIENDS OF IRISH FREEDOM (INC.),
NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
280 Broadway, New York City, May 15, 1920.

Hon. PETER F. TAGUE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It affords me great pleasure to transmit to you inclosed copy of resolution adopted by our national council at its meeting held May 14, 1920.

Esteeming your services in the cause of human freedom, I remain,
Sincerely, yours,

DIARMUID LYNCH,
National Secretary.

Copy of resolution adopted by the National Council of the Friends of Irish Freedom (Inc.), at its regular meeting held May 14, 1920, at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, New York:

"Whereas since the last meeting of the National Council of the Friends of Irish Freedom (Inc.) this organization has continued its work along the lines adopted by the Irish Race Convention in Philadelphia, 1919, which has brought security to American ideals and advancement of the Irish cause during the years just passed; and

"Whereas the past month has witnessed the address of a semiofficial communication by 88 United States Congressmen to the premier and Parliament of Great Britain protesting against England's treatment of Irishmen taken prisoner in Ireland by the exercise of England's might; and

"Whereas the said communication has been accepted by general public opinion as a powerful expression of the feeling behind the resolution recently presented in the House of Representatives by Congressman TAGUE, of Massachusets; and

"Whereas certain publications have unfortunately dealt with the subject editorially failing to differentiate between the acknowledgment of the fact that England's power in Ireland and the acknowledgment of England's right to that power in Ireland; failing also to recall that all of the advance toward the recognition of the Irish republic by the United States of America has been gained step by step through the enlightenment of American public opinion upon conditions in Ireland, and that to condemn such further steps is to condemn aiming at the target until the bull's-eye be actually struck; and

"Whereas any such indications of difference in policy or in practice must of necessity weaken our influence in the days of struggle which lie just ahead for the ideals of liberty; and

"Whereas an official expression of judgment in the circumstances becomes imperative: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That a protest against the exercise of power upon the part of an invader involves in no sense an acknowledgment of right upon the part of such invader to exercise such power; and be it further

"Resolved, That the public thanks of this, the supreme body of the Friends of Irish Freedom, be tendered to the 88 Congressmen, headed by Hon. CHAMP CLARK, who signed the communication described in the preamble hereto, and to Congressman TAGUE, of Massachusetts, for the introduction of his resolution; and be it finally

"Resolved, That the warm appreciation and recognition of the National Council be extended to Capt. Daniel T. O'Connell, of Boston, for the splendid services which he has rendered and continues to render as director of our bureau at Washington."

D. LYNCH,
National Secretary.

IRISH FACTIONISTS AIDING ENGLAND.

The protest against the ill-treatment of Irish political prisoners signed by 88 Members of Congress and cabled to Lloyd-George, British premier, and the Parliament of Great Britain, was a historic American document of which the signers have every reason to be proud. It pilloried the British Government before the world and showed that its tyrannical methods of ruling Ireland are wholly indefensible and inexcusable. That was a service to Ireland of the most important kind. It strengthened her demand for independence with American public opinion, and it put England to shame.

The effect in England may be gauged by the outburst of anger in the House of Commons and in the English daily newspapers which was reported in the cable dispatches. The more outspoken of the Englishmen wanted reprisals and attacked the United States for meddling in England's "domestic" affairs. The butchery and torture of Irishmen is a "domestic" privilege which England wants to be allowed to continue unmolested, and this dignified and emphatic protest from Washington upset their nerves and ruffled their temper, just as it gave comfort and consolation to the people of Ireland. It was much more effective for the moment, because the treatment of the prisoners was the news of the day, than a resolution recommending a political settlement of the Irish question, and it demonstrated the absolute necessity for a complete change of government in Ireland. In this respect it was similar to the protests against Spanish tyranny and cruelty in Cuba which prepared American public opinion for the intervention, which later set Cuba free. It ought, therefore, to be satisfactory to all thinking Irish citizens, and it undoubtedly is to 99 per cent of them. It is a step in the direction of recognition of the republic of Ireland; it prepares the way for it and gives a reason for recognition which appeals strongly to the American people's sense of justice and humanity, which is one of their most marked characteristics.

That this aspect of the cabled protest was at once clearly perceived by England's kept organs here is shown by the comments of the New York Times and the Evening Post. The editorial writers of these papers were very much perturbed at such a flagrant violation of international comity and the danger it involved of England resenting it, which would apparently be a terrible thing for the United States. Mr. Ochs (born in Germany, but more English than the English themselves) was very wroth, but tried to disguise his anger by dull sarcasm. But he left no doubt that he considered the protest a dreadful thing, that will surely hurt America later on. He doubtless wishes it so. Mr. Lamont, of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., who bought the Evening Post with English money for the British Government, was even more shocked than the bovine editor of the Times. So he got one of his new English scribes to point out the inconsistency of opposing the League of Nations and then sending a protest to England, which the league could attend to (by promptly smothering it) if the United States were a member of it. Neither of the two English organs could well defend the horrible treatment of the Irish prisoners, and they did not attempt to do so. The great crime in their eyes was not torturing men to death in prison, but the breach of international etiquette involved in protesting against it and interfering with a question of "domestic British politics." It was quite clear to them that the congressional protest gave a hard knock to the theory that Ireland is a "domestic British question" and that it practically recognized Ireland as a separate political entity held by force against the will of the people. This is the thing that stands out most clearly in the British and Anglo-American comment on the protest. It aroused rage in England and among England's hirelings in America because it was a hard blow to England. This is an incontrovertible fact and the chief feature from the Irish point of view.

There are two ways of estimating the character of action of this kind—its effect on our own people and its effect on our enemies. From both these points of view the congressional protest must be regarded as a distinct service to the Irish cause. It has encouraged and stimulated our own people by giving evidence of strong sympathy with Ireland in the American Congress, and it has disconcerted our enemies by putting them in the wrong before the civilized world. The attempt made by the Evening Post's Englishman (who is probably not a citizen) to show that it is all because of the forthcoming elections and the desire to get Irish votes only calls attention to the very important fact that those votes count by millions and will probably be the decisive factor in the presidential contest and in all the congressional battles in the Northern, Middle, and Western States next November. Supposing the Congressmen were not sincere (which is a monstrous assumption), their action is a recognition of this very important fact, and England is welcome to all the consolation she can get out of it.

The National Council of the Friends of Irish Freedom has expressed emphatic approval of this congressional action, and it has authority to speak for the Irish people in the United States as no other body has or ever had in the history of the race in America. It was selected to govern the Irish movement in America by the Irish race convention in Philadelphia, the greatest and most representative gathering ever held in the United States, and that power was delegated to it. Yet a small handful of Irishmen and two Irish papers, egged on by a sinister influence which seeks to disrupt the Irish movement in America to serve England's ends, and one Boston branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, have undertaken to undo the work of the national council and to defy its authority. They have attacked the Tague resolution and the congressional protest on the absurd ground that they do not recognize the Irish Republic and would interfere with the passage of the Mason bill. One of the dearest objects of the man who is undoubtedly directing this revolt against the national council and the attempt to split the national movement is to defeat the Mason bill, as he tried to beat the Gallagher resolution and to stop Irish opposition to the English League of Nations. But he works by devious methods and his best plan to deceive his dupes is to pretend extraordinary zeal for the Irish Republic. He wanted the resolutions in Philadelphia to make a demand for direct recognition of the Irish Republic, which would give President Wilson the chance he wanted of rejecting it. That was the object he wanted to accomplish. And in the same breath he wanted all opposition withdrawn to the League of Nations, which would strangle the Irish Republic at its birth. This showed the utter insincerity of his pretended zeal for the Irish Republic.

Similarly now this British agent wants all congressional protest against the ill-treatment of Irish prisoners stopped, on the ground that a demand that they be given a trial—a demand which puts England in a bad hole, because she admits she has no evidence—is an insult to the Irish Republic and a bar to the passage of the Mason bill. Of course, the pretence is transparently dishonest, but we have some pinheads and ax grinders among us who have seized on the pretext for doing mischief and venting their personal spite, so they have flooded the Congressmen with marked papers containing attacks upon them. The result is what the arch plotter intended—widespread resentment and disgust among the Congressmen at unmerited abuse from some of the people they tried to please, and a visible cooling off in the enthusiasm for the Mason bill.

If the bill fails to pass, or even be reported, the responsibility will rest on the shoulders of the factionists who have attacked the Congressmen who were doing the best they could for Ireland. And the factionists will not be allowed to get away from that responsibilty. They are acting under the direction of an insidious and malevolent influence outside the national movement, and their efforts to wreck it will be decisively defeated. Some of them openly appeal to branches to help them in their factional attacks, and are aiming plainly at disunion. The organization can not tolerate this kind of thing and live. The chief effort of the British agent is to discredit the organization and its leaders in Washington, so that the splendid work for Ireland now going on there may be stopped and England may triumph once more. Washington is now the center of the battle for Ireland, and our defeat there would be disastrous. England realizes this, and therefore is putting forth her best efforts. As so often before, Irish factionists, blinded by passion, are the instruments she uses. We must not be defeated; but to avert defeat this impudent attempt to create disunion in our ranks and paralyze our efforts must be stamped out at all costs. The bull must be taken by the horns at once.

Premier Lloyd-George has declared that the protest signed by 88 Members of Congress against imprisoning Irishmen without charges and without trial will not affect the policy of the British Government. We did not expect that it would. But it is well to have the protest on record. It also bothers Lloyd-George somewhat to explain to the world why such a protest should be made. He may not heed it, but the world knows that a condition exists in Ireland that mocks at all the professions of love for liberty made by England during the war.

ECHOES FROM THE NATIONAL CAPITAL—CONGRESSMEN CABLE PROTEST TO LLOYD-GEORGE—10,000 IN HOLY NAME PARADE—PRAISES AMERICA.

(By Stanton Lawton.)

Another step forward in bringing the British cabinet to a realization that America insists that Ireland be freed from oppression was taken by the 88 Congressmen who on May 4 cabled to Lloyd-George and the British Parliament the following protest:

"With the profound conviction that further wars and acts of war should be avoided, and believing that wholesale arrests without arraignment or trial disturb the peace and tranquillity of a people, are destructive of human rights, and are at variance with that principle of liberty which is embodied in the United States Constitution in the provision that no person shall be 'deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law,' the undersigned Members of Congress of the United States of America protest against further imprisonment without arraignment or trial of persons resident in Ireland arrested for acts of a political nature; and we ask in the spirit of American freedom and love of justice, out of our friendliness to the peoples of England and Ireland and in the name of international peace, that hereafter, if arrests based upon acts of a political nature are made in Ireland, by color of any form of authority, the right of trial shall without unreasonable delay be accorded to the accused."

This cablegram supports the resolution introduced two weeks ago by Representative PETER F. TAGUE, of Massachusetts, who also headed the committee of 20 Congressmen who conferred with Secretary of State Colby, asking that the State Department seek some form of relief for those held in prison without arraignment or trial.

At this writing Secretary Colby has not yet determined what action, if any, he will take.

AMERICA AND THE IRISH PRISONERS.

(By Charles Fulkerson.)

The protest against the savage treatment of Irish prisoners contained in the Tague resolution, followed by a cablegram to Lloyd-George, premier of Great Britain, and to the British Parliament, signed by nearly a hundred Members of Congress, which has already been sent, is one of the best services rendered to the Irish cause in many years. It is also a service to humanity by the greatest legislative body in the world, of the same character as that rendered to Cuba by various congressional resolutions, and by action of the United States Government in protest against the tyranny of Spain in Cuba.

The resolution and the protest differ essentially in character from all previous action taken in Congress in regard to Ireland, because they have a different purpose. The Gallagher resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the eve of President Wilson's second departure for Europe, asked for self-determination for Ireland; the Borah resolution, passed by a vote of 60 to 1 in the Senate, requested the admission of Ireland's delegates to the peace conference; the Gerry reservation to the peace treaty provided that Ireland be made a member of the League of Nations; and the Mason bill, which has not yet been passed, provides for practical recognition of the republic of Ireland. All of these dealt with the political solution of the Irish question. The present resolution and the cabled protest are an arraignment to the world of England's treatment of Irish political prisoners who are held without trial, treated as convicted men, and subjected to a savage system of persecution and torture from which England's ordinary convicts are free and which is not even sanctioned by British laws regulating the treatment of prisoners. The resolution and the cabled protest are an arraignment to the American people and to the whole world of England's conduct which can not fail to have a tremendous effect. They show that her professions of zeal for liberty and humanity are hollow and insincere, and that she is herself practicing the same tortures on her victims as her statesmen denounced in Czarist Russia and as Gladstone exposed in Naples and Sicily under the Bourbon King. To the American sense of justice the strongest appeal that can be made is that men are treated as convicts without a trial, and the demand of a trial is a challenge that England can not meet. Again and again Bonar Law has admitted in Parliament that the Sinn Feiners can not be tried because the Government has no evidence. His explanation that witnesses are deterred by fear of assassination is filmsy and inconclusive. Whatever the reason may be, they have no evidence against the prisoners, and they admit it, so trial by jury, the so-called palladium of liberty, is abolished, and men whom they can not try are tortured inhumanly by the despotic power of a Government which tramples on all safeguards of liberty that prevail in free countries.

Under these circumstances the demand coming from the American Congress that these prisoners be tried or liberated is the most practical service that can be rendered to the imprisoned men. The fact that the demand comes from the American Congress, or an important influential portion of its membership, puts the Lloyd-George Government in a very difficult position. The Government must either refuse to comply with it, and thereby injure itself still more in the estimation of the American people, or accede to it and put itself in a still worse position. If it heeds the demand, it can only comply with it in either of two ways—bringing the men to trial or liberating them. It admits it has not the evidence to try them. So the only other alternative is to liberate them. No government was ever on the horns of a worse dilemma. That is the main consideration in regard to the resolution.

There is nothing whatever in the resolution or the protest that is inconsistent with any previous action of Congress or with the provisions of the Mason bill. The British Government is still there, and it is against its action in regard to prisoners whom it holds that the protest is made. Refusal to heed it will strengthen the case of the Irish republic with the American people, while compliance with it would be an admission that England is in the wrong. Take it either way, therefore, and a great service is rendered to the Irish cause.

IRELAND.

On May 4, 88 Congressmen, 62 of whom are Democrats and 26 Republicans, sent this protest to Premier Lloyd-George and the British Parliament against the imprisonment, without arraignment or trial, of persons arrested in Ireland:

"With the profound conviction that further wars and acts of war should be avoided, and believing that wholesale arrests without arraignment or trial disturb the peace and tranquillity of a people, are destructive of human rights, and are at variance with that principle of liberty which is embodied in the United States Constitution in the provision that no person shall be 'deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law,' the undersigned, Members of the Congress of the United States of America, protest against further imprisonment, without arraignment or trial, of persons resident in Ireland arrested for acts of a political nature; and we ask in the spirit of American freedom and love of justice, out of our friendliness to the peoples of England and Ireland and in the name of international peace, that hereafter, if arrests based upon acts of a political nature are made in Ireland, by color of any form of authority, the right of trial shall without unreasonable delay be accorded to the accused."

On May 6 this message and allied topics were the subjects of interpellation and debate in Commons. Bottomly, the American baiter, asked what the Government knew of the Irish loan, De Valera's triumphant progress through the United States, his reception by governors, State legislatures, and so on. He further inquired if these did not constitute unfriendly acts. Capt. Benn demanded that the Government take steps to halt the American campaign in favor of Irish freedom. Mr. Chadwick was grieved that New Orleans honored "the outlaw," De Valera, with the freedom of the city. In the House of Lords, one Smith, now known as Baron Birkerhead, said that Great Britain was determined to continue its present policy toward Sinn Fein. There would be no relaxation of severity and no parley. He declared:

"Every single motive which led the United States to resist the attempt at secession would operate with even greater force to determine this country, and he would remind the Sinn Feiners that the race which had resisted the might of the German Empire would not yield to a section of desperate people in Ireland."

Birkerhead was supported by a cable sent to Northcliffe by Demarest Lloyd, of Boston, president of that very amusing society known as the Loyal Coalition. Lloyd called the Congressmen's message impertinent and consoled Great Britain by assuring the premier that these congressmen would pay at the polls for this meddlesome interference. The Methodist conference in session at Des Moines was equally sympathetic with Britain and passed a resolution which, in effect, condemned Irish freedom, the second resolution of the kind passed by Methodist conferences. And this in spite of the fact that within 15 months more than 5,000 Irish men and women have been arrested and jailed, in most cases without even a charge.

OMAHA, NEBR., May 22, 1920.

Hon. PETER F. TAGUE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The peace treaty in the covenant of the League of Nations, evolved from the secret session held in Versailles, placed the great, free Republic of America in a false position. Nations were led to believe that America's protest against and the monstrous evil of government by conquest was intended to apply only to the subdued Provinces held by Germany and Austria.

The 88 Congressmen, among whom you have the undying honor of being enrolled, have truly represented the policy of a free people that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

The Irish Self-Determination Club of Nebraska hereby expresses its heartfelt gratitude for the unselfish, humanitarian principles contained in your protest to the British Parliament, and this expression of gratitude is shared not only by the Irish race throughout the world but by all people who honor the Constitution of the United States, the only document in the history of the world which guarantees liberty and justice.

Respectfully, THE IRISH SELF-DETERMINATION CLUB.
P. A. DARCY.

I believe that the foregoing statements will dispel any doubts relative to the sincerity of my purpose in sponsoring H. Res. 520 and the cablegram to Lloyd-George. In my opinion this agitation by ill-advised friends of Ireland was subsequently the cause for the Mason bill failing of consideration in this session of Congress.

After the introduction of the Tague resolution I headed a delegation of Members of the House of Representatives who called upon Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby with reference to H. Res. 520. As spokesman, I presented the matter as follows:

The purpose of this conference, Mr. Secretary, is to direct your attention to the present situation in Ireland as regards the imprisonment of citizens of Ireland by the British Government, no charges being made against them other than that they were under suspicion of being identified with the movement for independence for Ireland. Men prominent in British governmental circles have admitted that there are no specific charges against these prisoners and no apparent reason for holding them in confinement. On Tuesday last a crowd of 20,000 people surrounded the Mountjoy prison at Dublin as a protest against the holding of these men, and the news alarms us men of Irish blood in America. It only needed "the spark in the powder" to cause a tremendous riot accompanied by bloodshed and disorders of a serious nature. You have seen the resolution introduced by me in the House of Representatives asking that the State Department make representations to the British Government requesting that these political prisoners, for such they are and not felons, be arraigned for trial or released immediately.

This action is imperative, because the people of Ireland have borne the British yoke too long and the days of submissive acceptance have passed. The danger of an uprising is imminent, and it is for us Americans to follow the previous actions of our Government on similar occasions. We acted in the Kishineff incident, in the Congo Free State incident, and in Armenia and Cuba. The need was never so urgent as it is in Ireland to-day. I shall present a compilation of precedents for this desired action this afternoon, signed by the delegation here present, and we urge your prompt and earnest consideration.

Mr. Colby said that he was impressed by the personnel and size of the delegation. The importance of the matter, he said, appealed to him and he was very desirous of seeing some relief extended to Ireland if it were possible. He asked that the committee present a list of precedents for such action by the State Department, and said that no time would be lost in apprising the members of the result of his decision. A statement was prepared and submitted, by a select committee of those attending the conference, to the Secretary of State, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1920.

The Hon. BAINBRIDGE COLBY,
Secretary of State.

SIR: In compliance with your suggestion, offered at the time of our conference this morning, we, acting as a select committee on behalf of some 87 Members of the House of Representatives, submit herewith our views on the necessity of and some precedents for immediate action by the Government of the United States for the amelioration of the condition of Irish political prisoners now lying in English jails.

Not only has the United States, through previous action under somewhat similar circumstances, committed itself to a policy of exercising its good offices to the end that the rights of humanity be upheld when trampled upon in other parts of the world, but great authorities in international law have from the very earliest times conceded that action by one country in exerting its influence upon another in such instances as this now under consideration is entirely justified.

Hodges in The Doctrine of Intervention (pp. 87–91) points out that there have been in the past many cases of justifiable intervention in the cause of humanity, but that the consensus of opinion is that each case must be judged on its own merits. Writing in 1915, when the great moral issues of the last war had not fully disclosed themselves, he pronounced that "as the feeling of general interest in humanity increases, and with it a world-wide desire for something approaching justice and international solidarity, interventions undertaken in the interests of humanity will also doubtless increase."

May we, before proceeding further, call your attention to some of the salient facts regarding the case of the Irish political prisoners? Owing to the rigid censorship and to the secrecy which surrounded the arrest of these prisoners, it is almost impossible at this time to submit any exact figures of the number of Irish men and women now in prison, without having either been charged with any specific crime or given a hearing or trial. The number, however, may be judged by the fact that in Mountjoy jail, Dublin, there were, up to yesterday, as we understand it, not less than 112 political prisoners. These prisoners were confined with the ordinary criminals. Practically all of them had been imprisoned without trial. In protest against this crime against justice they had refused for several days to partake of the prison fare. Yesterday 68 of them, of whom about 20 were on the point of death and may yet pass away, were released on command from the viceroy of Ireland, only when public opinion, not alone in Ireland but throughout the world, had expressed itself in forcible terms.

We believe that conditions in Ireland, particularly with regard to the treatment of political prisoners, are such as to warrant the United States in exerting its good offices to the end that justice shall be done. As was pointed out to you this morning by the several spokesmen for our delegation, the unjust treatment of these prisoners has given rise to a situation which may at any moment cause very grave international complications. In the cause of humanity and of international peace, we believe that representation should be made to the British Government, requesting that these political prisoners be given fair trial or their immediate release.

The bulk of these men and women are members either of the republican national assembly or of the Irish local government boards. They are persons of the highest integrity and of standing in their communities. They were elected by the votes of the Irish people and are their duly accredited representatives. It is charged that the sole reason for their arrest was the effort of the British Government to prevent the lawful handling and apportionment of the public moneys of Ireland and the transaction of public business, and thus to prevent the normal growth of prosperity in that country.

In the past 100 years the United States Government has many times interposed its influence and exercised its good offices in the interest of justice in other lands.

As early as 1840 our good offices were exerted in the interests of the persecuted Jews in Mohammedan countries and, in subsequent years, in Russia and in Roumania. Our active interest in seeing that justice was done to the Jewish people culminated in December, 1911, in the abrogation of our commercial treaty with Russia, as a protest against the outrages at Kishineff and other Russian cities.

At that time Hon. Curtis Guild, ambassador to Russia, replying to the expressions of surprise by the Russian foreign minister, Sazonoff, informed him in very strong terms that, despite of effort to have it appear that the United States was always governed by motives of financial gain, the people of America were, on the contrary, ever ready to make sacrifices in the interests of justice and of humanity.

This indeed has been, it would seem, our consistent policy. Hon. John Bassett Moore, in American Diplomacy, page 142, points out that our intervention in Cuba was due entirely to the "abhorrent conditions" there. "On this ground," he says, "the intervention was justified by the late Alphonse Rivier, one of the most eminent publicists in Europe."

In the case of Cuba the United States several times used its influence in an endeavor to remedy conditions. On June 23, 1873, Secretary of State Fish wrote Ambassador Thomas in Spain, requesting him to present the case of Cuba to the Spanish Government and to remonstrate for Spain's failure to take steps to remedy conditions. "Our commercial and other connections with that island compel us to take a warm interest * * *," the Secretary of State wrote.

In 1905 and 1906, Secretary of State Olney, in communications with M. Dupuy de Lôme, tendered the good offices of the United States with a view to settlement of conditions in Cuba.

President Cleveland, in his annual message of December 7, 1896, announced to Congress that he felt "bound * * * to protest against uncivilized and inhumane conduct" of the Spaniards in Cuba. Protest after protest was made by this Government against Spain's policy of concentration.

We have made no effort to present to you all of the precedents for the United States using its influence in behalf of the Irish political prisoners. We have merely outlined, in a general way, what we believe to be the traditional policy of the United States. You have at your disposal the Consular Reports and the State papers, from which, we believe, you will be able to satisfy yourself as to the policy of the United States in the past. We beg to call to your attention, however, that, in addition to marked precedent, we have to-day a further justification for action in the cause of justice. The United States and its allies fought the Great War with noble pledges upon their lips. The whole world, as the result of that war, has entered upon a new era. Right and justice have supplanted selfish national expediency. A new code of international equity has been written.

"In coming into this war," said President Wilson, January 27, 1919, "the United States never for a moment thought that she was intervening in the politics of Europe, or the politics of Asia, or the politics of any part of the world. Her thought was that all the world had now become conscious that there was a single cause of justice and of liberty for men of every kind and place."

Respectfully submitted.

Select committee, representing nearly one hundred Members of the House of Representatives.

The introduction of and the publicity given this resolution had its immediate effect, because within a day or so the more seriously ill of the citizens of Ireland held in prisons by the British Government were released. While I do not claim that this was done because of my resolution, I can not but feel that it was in no small measure responsible for this action by the British Government. Because the Foreign Affairs Committee was occupied with the Mason bill no action was taken on my resolution, but I am satisfied that it was an instrument whereby the persecuted citizens of Ireland were released, and for that I am thankful.

In all my activities for the Irish cause I have given way to those men who have made a thorough study of economic and political situations in Ireland. During the past few months I have had the good fortune to be closely associated with President De Valera, of the Irish republic; Hon. Daniel F. Cohalan; and Capt. Daniel T. O'Connell, the director of the National Bureau of Information, Friends of Irish Freedom. Believing that they had the best interests of Ireland at heart, I have always sought their counsel and have never acted on the Irish question without first securing their sanction. In union and in union alone can we prove to the world that the citizens of Ireland are able and ready to govern themselves.

Washington wrote:

Patriots of Ireland! Champions of liberty in all lands! Be strong in hope! Your cause is identical with mine. You are calumniated in your day; I was misrepresented by the loyalists in my day. Had I failed the scaffold would be my doom. But now my enemies pay me honor. Had I failed I would have deserved the same honor. I stood true to my cause, even when victory had fled. In that I merited success. You must act likewise.

OF
HON. RICHARD YATES,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, at Grant's Tomb on Decoration Day I had the honor of making some remarks, and I ask unanimous consent to extend them in the RECORD, with the assurance that they do not refer to the bonus or any other problems of political matters.

ADDRESS ON DECORATION DAY, MAY 31, 1920, AT THE TOMB OF GRANT, RIVERSIDE DRIVE, NEW YORK, N. Y., BY RICHARD YATES, OF ILLINOIS, CONGRESSMAN AT LARGE.

Ladies and gentlemen, my fellow countrymen: Tender and touching memories and thoughts crowd about us to-day.

Tender and touching, indeed, is the circumstance that here before you on this platform sits the beloved granddaughter of Gen. Grant.

Her appearance is all the more interesting because, until the Bolsheviki overran Russia and overturned the Russian Government, she and her husband, who is also here, were part of that Government. The old Government of old Russia has claims upon our gratitude. During the Civil War the English Government was not our friend, and neither was the French Government. But the Russian Government was. And in a very anxious hour, when we were being threatened by most unfriendly French and British attitudes, great Russian fleets silently steamed into both New York Harbor and San Francisco Harbor, in effect saying, "You have us to deal with also." Their very arrival caused England and France to hesitate and finally to remain neutral. This was in 1863.

Fellow citizens, tender and touching, indeed, have been the words and phrases with which I have just been introduced into this imposing presence by Capt. Hedley.

Your old friend, Capt. F. Y. Hedley, the accomplished, eloquent, and revered presiding officer, year in and year out, at your annual exercises on this day, the Memorial Day of America—how you have delighted to honor him!

My old friend, Capt. Hedley, noble Union veteran of the Civil War, soldier of blessed and glorious Illinois, friend and supporter of my blessed old father—how delighted I am to be honored by him!

I assure you I am most grateful for all the courtesy, cordiality, and hospitality of which I am to-day the recipient. It shall never be forgotten.

You will surely pardon me for dwelling and lingering upon the satisfaction felt at being your guest to-day on this holy ground.

It would be a thing to be proud of all my days to be summoned here to speak of our country without any other subject or theme—our country, mighty and model Republic; our country, noblest of Commonwealths; our country, child of the centuries, heir of the ages, beacon light of liberty, last hope of humanity.

In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea;
Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee;
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee.

And I would consider it a thing to be proud of all my days to be summoned here to speak of Illinois.

Illinois! Two hundred and fifty-nine thousand young men—an entire one-sixth of the whole State's population—it sent forth 55 years ago to do battle and to dare and if need be die on a thousand fields of glory in the red glare of the cannon's mouth for union and liberty, for you and for me, for our children's children, and for the eternal right.

To the scaffold in Chicago 35 years ago Illinois sent the convicted anarchists who sought by dynamite bomb and by lurid editorial to overthrow our free government—to the scaffold and a grave of infamy 6 feet below the soil of Cook County, from whence the odious red flag of anarchy has not been resurrected in Illinois.

To the State penitentiary, from time to time, Illinois has sent the violators of the sacred laws of suffrage, to the end that political rights might be preserved inviolate, which example of Illinois—namely, a free ballot and a fair count—must yet be followed by all the States before we can have government by consent of the governed and a real republic with enfranchisement.

And for the sanctity of the suffrage, the honesty of municipal government, the elevation of citizenship, the firm establishment of equal rights, mighty Illinois stands to-day, schoolbook in hand, teaching children by the millions what liberty means and what it cost. Oh, beloved Illinois!

Not without thy wondrous story,
Illinois, Illinois!
Could be writ the Nation's glory,
Illinois, Illinois!
On the record of thy years
Abraham Lincoln's name appears,
Grant and Logan and our tears,
Illinois, Illinois!

How proud, then, ought a man to be who is not limited to the theme covering America, not restricted to the limitations of a Fourth of July speech or an Illinois oration, but can talk of the lofty life and dauntless death and daring deeds of all the dead whose dust we have covered with flowers!

On Fame's eternal camping-ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

With what distinguished guests are we associated on such an occasion as this. In addition to Glory and Fame, there are Honor and Freedom.

How sleep the brave, who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
Here Honor comes, a pilgrim gray
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair
To dwell, a weeping hermit, there.

GLIMPSES OF THE SPIRIT OF GRANT.

Capt. Hedley has referred to the fact that it was my father who gave the first Civil War commission to the man uppermost in our thoughts to-day.

There is one man, of course, over and above all other men, of whom we are all thinking at this time and place—Ulysses S. Grant.

I had one conversation with Gen. Grant. It was in 1880 at my beautiful native town, the lovely little city, Jacksonville, Ill. He made a speech of 20 words to 20,000 people. Later he drove to my widowed mother's home and called upon her. This 1880 visit was, of course, after he had been twice President. It was as he sat in his carriage about to go from my mother's house to the depot that I had my memorable conversation. I was making my living by working as reporter on the local daily journal, trying to earn and save enough money to go to law school. Urged by my employer (for I was reluctant, because he was for the moment my mother's guest), I asked him if he would say something in response to a request for an interview for my little paper. The interview comprised the one word "no." But he was not unkind. He was grave but gentle. And I did not feel discriminated against, for had he not just spoken before 20,000 people with a speech of 20 words?

I had had, when a boy of 8, another glimpse of him at my father's boarding house in Washington in 1868, when Grant, then general in chief, called upon my father, then a Senator.

I have always been glad that I had these two glimpses of Ulysses S. Grant. But, of course, it was not an acquaintance. It could be called only a negligible acquaintance at the outside.

My father, however, as Capt. Hedley has told you, knew him well, and a certain book mentions this friendship. There is a two-volume book entitled "Personal Memoirs of U. S. Grant," printed in 1885, the year of his death. In this book there is a dedicatory page reading as follows:

These volumes are dedicated to the American soldier and sailor.
U. S. GRANT.

Ah, that dedication! When I first read it in 1885, at the age of 24, I was tremendously impressed and affected by it. And now that I am 59 in 1920, I am just as much impressed and affected as ever, just as much so as I was in 1885, 35 years ago. It has the sublimity of simplicity in every syllable. But to me it seems pregnant with deepest feeling and emphasis. Years ago I heard a poet described as a fire surrounded by ice, the meaning being that under a calm exterior there was a tumultuous being, tempestuous, inflammable. So it is with these few words. There is a wealth of meaning. They were not idle words—not mere compliment. He unquestionably meant that in his affliction and weakness and poverty he had nothing to give to the brave men, living and dead, who had followed and served under him—nothing but his benediction. It was, without words of praise, the simple acknowledgment that all his towering and overpowering achievement was saturated with their blood, sacrifice, suffering, agony, and anguish; that his devotion was entwined, enmeshed, enveloped, enwrapped by theirs. When he used the words "dedicated to the American soldier and sailor"—declared his book dedicated to them—it was equal to a statement that he deliberately preferred that dedication to any other; that he had carefully considered other dedications but had deliberately determined that the Yankee soldier and the Yankee sailor, the Yankee fighting boy, should receive that benediction from him. Beautiful farewell!

After this terse dedication there occurs a preface—it is dated July 1, 1885, 22 days before his death—and, oh, that preface! However others may feel, I have always been much impressed with this preface. Its utter modesty is characteristic, while noticeable. There is ample use of the word "I" and the word "me," but in every line there speaks the unassuming man, very modest but very real. You feel, as you read, the bald, bare facts regarding the publication. Note such expressions as "I was living on borrowed money." The page tells you impulsively; you see the point instinctively.

You instinctively say to yourself that it is the naked truth which has been written down here for you to see; and when you reflect that death did, indeed, follow close upon this book you realize that it was in the full knowledge of the nearness of the Judge of all men and of His tribunal and of His eternal justice that the book was written. It follows that we may be very, very sure that the observations and estimates and judgments contained in the book are just; as just as human judgment, very fallible, can make them.

I can almost see the grim old warrior, the silent commander, sitting at Mount McGregor penning these lines. He is sitting propped up on the porch at the summer cottage, slowly forming the letters and words. Dictation is impossible, because of the sore throat slowly killing him. Clerks and stenographers are at hand in plenty, but a cancer is raging and flaming at the tongue and he can not speak. Can there be any doubt as to whether the words used were intentional? For one I am positively sure that not a word was wasted. In other words, it is apparent that he "meant what he said." It follows that, like Washington's Farewell Address, emphasis may be attached to every phrase.

I take the liberty to read the preface entire:

"Man proposes and God disposes." There are but few important events in the affairs of men brought about by their own choice.

Although frequently urged by friends to write my memoirs, I had determined never to do so, nor to write anything for publication. At the age of nearly 62 I received an injury from a fall, which confined me closely to the house, while it did not apparently affect my general health. This made study a pleasant pastime. Shortly after the rascality of a business partner developed itself by the announcement of a failure. This was followed soon after by universal depression of all securities, which seemed to threaten the extinction of a good part of the income still retained and for which I am indebted to the kindly act of friends. At this juncture the editor of the Century Magazine asked me to write a few articles for him. I consented for the money it gave me, for at that moment I was living upon borrowed money. The work I found congenial, and I determined to continue it. The event is an important one for me, for good or evil. I hope for the former.

In preparing these volumes for the public I have entered upon the task with the sincere desire to avoid doing injustice to anyone, whether on the National or Confederate side, other than the unavoidable injustice of not making mention often where special mention is due. There must be many errors of omission in this work, because the subject is too large to be treated of in two volumes in such way as to do justice to all the officers and men engaged. There were thousands of instances during the rebellion of individual, company, regimental, and brigade deeds of heroism which deserve special mention and are not here alluded to. The troops engaged in them will have to look to the detailed reports of their individual commanders for the full history of those deeds.

The first volume, as well as a portion of the second, was written before I had reason to suppose I was in a critical condition of health. Later I was reduced almost to the point of death, and it became impossible for me to attend to anything for weeks. I have, however, somewhat regained my strength, and am able often to devote as many hours a day as a person should devote to such work. I would have more hope of satisfying the expectation of the public if I could have allowed myself more time. I have used my best efforts, with the aid of my eldest son, F. D. Grant, assisted by his brothers, to verify from the records every statement of fact given. The comments are my own, and show how I saw the matters treated of whether others saw them in the same light or not.

With these remarks I present these volumes to the public, asking no favor but hoping they will meet the approval of the reader.

U. S. GRANT.

MOUNT MCGREGOR, N. Y., July 7, 1885.

There are two other things from this book which I feel justified in reading to-day. The first is contained in pages 200 and 201 of volume 1. It is a description of the kind of hard fighting done by the soldiers of the Civil War. I quote from the chapter entitled "Battle of the Wilderness":

At 4.15 in the afternoon Lee attacked our left. His line moved up to within a hundred yards of ours and opened a heavy fire. * * * The enemy pushed through our lines, planting their flags on a part of the intrenchments not on fire. * * * Fighting had continued from 5 in the morning sometimes along the whole line, at other times only in places. The ground fought over varied in width, but averaged three-quarters of a mile. The killed, and many of the severely wounded, of both armies lay within this belt, where it was practically impossible to reach them. The woods were set on fire by the bursting shells and the conflagration raged. The wounded who had not strength to move themselves were either suffocated or burned to death. Finally, the fire communicated with our breastworks in places. Being constructed of wood they burned with great fury. But the battle still raged, our men firing through the flames until it became too hot to remain longer. Lee was now in distress. * * * During the night all of Lee's army withdrew within their intrenchments.

It seems that in Grant's day there was fighting, too.

The other thing I feel justified in reading is Grant's little, plain description of his first meeting with Lincoln—momentous meeting. Listen to this modest recital (p. 121, vol. 2):

Although hailing from Illinois myself, the State of the President, I never met Mr. Lincoln until called to the Capital to receive my commission as lieutenant general. I knew him, however, very well and favorably from the accounts given by officers under me at the West who had known him all their lives.

I had also read the remarkable series of debates between Lincoln and Douglas a few years before when they were rival candidates for the United States Senate. I was then a resident of Missouri, and by no means a "Lincoln man" in that contest, but I recognized then his great ability.

All he wanted or had ever wanted was some one who would take the responsibility and act and call on him for all the assistance needed, pledging himself to use all the power of the Government in rendering such assistance.

Assuring him that I would do the best I could with the means at hand, and avoid, as far as possible, annoying him at the War Department, our first interview ended. In our interview the President told me he did not want to know what I proposed to do.

And now may I, since you have heard Grant's description of the soldier in action, his fighting friend, and of Lincoln in action, his foremost friend—may I read you a page in which Grant referred to Yates in action, his first friend? May I do this? I sincerely hope that you do not feel that it is indelicate coming from me.

I read from volume 1, page 232:

In time the Galena company was mustered into the United States service, forming a part of the Eleventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry. My duties, I thought, had ended at Springfield, and I was prepared to start home by the evening train, leaving at 9 o'clock. Up to that time I do not think I had been introduced to Gov. Yates or had ever spoken to him. I knew him by sight, however, because he was living at the same hotel and I often saw him at table.

The evening I was to quit the capital I left the supper room before the governor and was standing at the front door when he came out. He spoke to me, calling me by my old Army title, "Captain," and said he understood that I was about leaving the city. I answered that I was. He said he would be glad if I would remain overnight and call at the executive office the next morning. I complied with his request, and was asked to go into the adjutant general's office and render such assistance as I could, the governor saying that my Army experience would be of great service there. I accepted the proposition.

On page 234 the narrative continues after this manner:

As I have stated, the legislature authorized the governor to accept the services of the additional regiments. I had charge of mustering these regiments into the State service.

The only other passages in the memoirs of interest in this connection are on pages 241 and 242.

Having but little to do after the muster of the last of the regiments authorized by the State legislature, I asked and obtained of the governor leave of absence for a week to visit my parents in Covington, Ky. (p. 241).

The Twenty-first Illinois, mustered in by me at Mattoon, refused to go into the service with the colonel of their selection in any position. While I was still absent Gov. Yates appointed me colonel of this latter regiment (p. 242).

A few days after I was in charge of it and in camp near Springfield.

Did time permit I would call attention at some length to the extreme and excessive particularity with which Grant, in 1885, thus described his first talk with Yates in 1861. It could scarcely have been written down with greater particularity. For example, he says:

The evening train leaving at 9 o'clock.

Why mention 9 o'clock or the evening train or any train? Please note again:

I knew the governor by sight.

Why mention this?

I left the supper room before the governor.

Why mention who left first or mention the room at all? And please note again:

He—the governor—spoke to me, calling me by my old Army title, "Captain," and said—

And so forth. Why mention that the governor called him by the old Army title, "Captain"? And again:

He said * * * remain overnight * * * and call the next morning.

Please note, finally, that even when he tells of his interview with the immortal Lincoln he indulges in no such minuteness of detail in detailing the conversation—does not tell what title the President addressed him by or what room they were in or who entered first. Ah, I think I know why he put this all down there in those painful hours at Mount McGregor waiting for death. That little hour at Springfield was a critical hour—a crisis in his life. His life had been one disappointment after another—one distasteful occupation had followed another, and he frankly admits they were all failures, more or less. A letter he had written to the adjutant general of the Regular Army had been ignored—buried. This invitation by Gov. Yates was the first smile of fortune since graduation at West Point in 1843—nearly 20 years before. Is it any wonder that at Mount McGregor in the evening of life, tortured almost to death by pain, distressed by debt, saddened by the ingratitude of pretended friends—is it any wonder that on some sleepless evening as he sat there beside the sea and looked upon the restless Atlantic he should recall his stormy life?

Is it any wonder that then, there at Mount McGregor, in late May, 1885, he recalled that quiet night in early May, 1861—that night at Springfield, when the night train left without him—that happy and memorable night, when suddenly, after 20 years of disappointment, right athwart his troubled, anxious path came the friendly touch of the friendly hand of another anxious, troubled man?

Is it any wonder that all intervening events were forgotten and he seemed to see his governor and to hear him calling him again, "Captain"—his governor tendering help and at the same time seeking help, and asking nothing in the world but that the two might work and build and strain and strive together for the Nation's salvation? Can we not almost visualize it all? I can almost see them standing there, hand clasped in hand, destined soon to possess tremendous power, destined later to return to private life, and destined finally to return to their Maker, possessing no fortune but a people's gratitude and leaving no inheritance but a good name.

The following from my father's message to the Legislature of Illinois, January 2, 1865, conveys his opinion of Grant and his version of how the latter obtained this first Civil War commission:

In April, 1861, he tendered his personal services to me, saying that he had been the recipient of a military education at West Point, and that now, when the country was involved in a war for its preservation and safety, he thought it his duty to offer his services in defense of the Union.

The plain, straightforward demeanor of the man and the modesty and earnestness which characterized his offer of assistance at once impressed me with a desire to secure his counsel for the benefit of volunteer organizations then forming for Government service.

At first I assigned him a desk in the executive office, and his familiarity with military organization and regulations made him an invaluable assistant in my own and the office of the adjutant general.

Soon his admirable qualities as a military commander became apparent, and I assigned him to command of the camps of organization at Camp Yates, Springfield; Camp Grant, Mattoon; and Camp Douglas, at Anna, Union County, at which the Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, Twelfth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth, and Twenty-first Regiments of Illinois Volunteers were rendezvoused.

His employment had special reference to the organization and muster of these forces.

The Twenty-first Regiment, organized at the camp at Mattoon, had become demoralized, and doubts arose concerning their acceptance.

I was much perplexed to find an efficient and experienced officer to take command of the regiment and take it into the three months' service. I ordered the regiment to Camp Yates, and after consulting Hon. Jesse K. Dubois, who had many friends in the regiment, and Col. John S. Loomis, assistant adjutant general, who was at the time in charge of the adjutant general's office and on terms of personal intimacy with Grant, I telegraphed Capt. Grant, then on a visit to his father at Covington, Ky., tendering the colonelcy. He immediately reported, accepting the commission, taking rank as colonel of that regiment from the 15th day of June, 1861. In less than 10 days he filled the regiment to the maximum standard and brought it to a state of discipline seldom attained. His was the only regiment that left the camp of organization on foot. He soon distinguished himself as a regimental commander.

I can not refrain before passing on from quoting this passage from that same message of my father:

I know well the secret of Grant's power, for afterwards, when I saw him at headquarters, upon the march, and on the battle field, in his plain, threadbare uniform, modest in his deportment, careful of all the wants of the humblest soldier, personally inspecting all the divisions of the Army, calm amidst the destructive fire of the enemy, it was evident that he had the confidence of every man, from the highest officer down to the humblest drummer boy in his whole command. His generalship rivals that of Alexander and Napoleon, and his armies eclipse those of Greece and Rome in their proudest days of imperial grandeur.

THE HUNDRED AND FORTY YEARS' FIGHT FOR FREEDOM.

The hundred and forty years' fight for freedom by America's millions.

It would be a pleasure to speak and read about Gen. Grant throughout the entire day, but we must not forget that this day we celebrate belongs not only to Gen. Grant but to all who served and sacrificed 55 years ago, or at any time, that American liberty might not die. It is my duty to endeavor to the best of my feeble ability to give suitable expression to the sentiments that have brought you here and to the teachings of this hour gleaned from all the past. We are in the presence of too impressive a spectacle to gather with any feelings less exalted than those of gratitude and reverence and patriotism. For not we only are observing this occasion. All over the land old muster rolls are being called amid the roll of muffled drums, and new flowers are being laid on old graves, and falling tears are bedewing many dainty, fragile flowers on graves that are new, while new bugles blow the notes of "Taps—lights out," far and near over land and sea. Amid a deepening sentiment of brotherhood all classes and conditions combine to decorate the patriot's resting place, to recall the virtues of his life and death, and to throw upon the unresponsive soil evergreens, suggestive of the life to come, the life beyond the grave. There are a hundred millions standing with us to-day as we salute the dead, and I believe that the dead millions know that we are saluting. Believing as I do that death does not end all, but that life is everlasting and the soul immortal, I believe also that those who have gone before are interested in us and come near us when they can, and sometimes very near indeed. Consequently, I believe that the millions of American patriots now in heaven are not far from us at this hour. Could our eyes be opened, I think their shining presence could be seen at our very elbows. It is recorded in Holy Writ that when the young man became confused and confounded and in his blindness went to the prophet, God at Elisha's prayer opened the eyes of the young man, "and, behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire." I thought of this when I saw in New York a year ago the parade up Fifth Avenue of the Seventy-seventh Division of the American Army, commanded by Gen. Alexander.

Far in front of the general and his staff, in front even of the police escort, marched 30 men each bearing a banner. Each banner or standard bore 100 gold stars, 3,000 in all, corresponding to the number of men from that division who lost their lives. After the 3,000 stars of gold there was a gap of three blocks, that is, there was a gap in the line three blocks long, and then came the division. I heard a thoughtless man in the reviewing stand say, "The standard bearers are out of place"; but a thoughtful woman said, "No; this gap is intentional; these are the dead who are passing now," and he uncovered—so did we all. I never saw a more impressive sight. Far as the eye could reach the uncounted multitude stood uncovered and a million eyes were wet.

'Twas but a moment, for that respect
Which clothes all courage their voices checked,
And through the ranks there crept an awe
In whispers, and some men saw—even as in the days of "John Burns, of Gettysburg."

As we felt that day let us feel to-day in the presence of our dead. And to whom shall we render honor?

THE DAYS OF 1776.

These sacrifices, continuing up to our day and generation, reach back more than a century. A historic darkness follows a historic day. British force has undertaken to coerce the high-minded and valorous tillers of Massachusetts soil. The falling night drops like a pall upon the martyred forms of those destined to constitute the first-formed section of our roll of illustrous American dead, our own Westminster Abbey. The very sound of their names rekindles in the American spirit the sacred flame which glowed in the hearts of our patriotic fathers who fought and fell around about the camp fires which cradled our liberties.

REMEMBER EARLY HEROES.

Drop a lily on the scaffold grave of Nathan Hale, executed as a spy. Over Marion and his troopers rear a mound of white. Deck the spot where the Green Mountain boys sleep. Give forget-me-nots for the rower who pulled the chief over the Delaware the night that Trenton fell. Jessamine for Molly Pitcher, who fired the old brass cannon after her husband was cut down at Monmouth. Bluebells and other blooms for the three militiamen whom Maj. André's gold could not corrupt nor bribe. We can not afford to pass one of these heroes by without, in spirit at least, depositing a blossom upon the sod.

AND NOW COMES THE FLAG—THE FLAG OF THE FREE.

All hail to thee, thou grand old flag, still floating o'er the free,
Though soiled and torn by traitor's hands, thou'rt doubly dear to me.
When in my boyhood's early years I saw thee first unfurled,
I deemed thee then the pride of earth, the glory of the world.
And when in later years I stood in busy haunts of men,
And saw thee float o'er field and flood, old flag, I loved thee then.
But now when in thy glorious light no slave need cringe or bow,
My father's and my country's flag, I love thee better now.
I'll bear thee up, thou dear old flag of origin divine,
Until upon thy azure folds a hundred stars shall shine.
Float on, old flag, until thy stripes shall all the nations heal
And tyranny through all the earth shall thy just vengeance feel.

THE WAR OF 1812.

After 30 years a new division of the national history appears. A new era of carnage and devotion is in sight. Outrages upon the waters are committed upon American seamen. The mother country has brought on the war of 1812. It is a peculiar war. But America is again battling for the right. The battles are few. There is no American scheme of conquest, and the national feeling will be gratified entirely when England abandons her claims on the sea. At first demoralization oppresses the Union and dims the glory of its arms. On the north, Detroit is fallen; on the east, Washington City is captured; and all along the coast a strict and rigid blockade is attempted.

UNEXPECTED GLORY.

But Capts. Hull and Bainbridge, with the old ship Constitution, and Decatur, with the stanch United States, give unexpected glory to the Union on the sea. To her utter surprise England loses in the contest for the supremacy of the waves, loses all she gains on land, loses in the estimation of the world, loses an army shot to pieces by Andrew Jackson firing from behind the cotton bales at New Orleans, and peace comes again. The heroes of that time have gone. None at all remain in the land they protected. But we are here to-day to demonstrate that we do not forget the efforts they made and the services they rendered in that dark hour and that critical time.

Let us never underestimate those fighters of 1812, for they, too, kept the flag in the sky—our colors—"dearest creation of cloth, most precious combination of colors."

TO THE COLORS.

What is it to "go to the colors"?
What does it mean? Oh, its meaning is almost beyond words.
Hats off, along the street there comes
The blare of bugles, the ruffle of drums,
A flare of color beneath the sky.
Hats off, the flag is passing by.
Crimson and blue and white, it shines,
Over the ordered, steel-tipped lines.
Hats off, the flag is passing by.
But more than the flag is passing by;
Weary marches and sinking ships,
And cheers of victory from dying lips;
Years of plenty and days of peace.
The march of a strong land's swift increase.
Oh, duty and honor and glory all
Are with the colors, to stand or fall.

THE MEXICAN WAR.

After another third of a century the third section of our story is created. The States now number 28. The national strength has grown with the passing of the years. Conquest and the extension of the western boundary have glittered before the politician's eye, and dazzled the vision of all, until at last the country is compelled to array itself in war against Mexico to protect the national honor. Once more the bugle sounds and the loud drumbeat responds. Palo Alto and Resaca are followed by Buena Vista and Monterey. After Vera Cruz comes Chapultepec, and then Mexico succumbs and the grand review of victors delights our land.

FLOWERS FOR THEM, TOO.

And so we have another flower for Winfield Scott, a flower for Zachary Taylor, and one for our own noble John J. Hardin, whose precious blood Illinois reluctantly but uncomplainingly surrenders that no spot may blur the blaze of the escutcheon of the Nation. The Mexican War veterans have not all left us. Some few are still among us, full of years and full of honors. We would have them all to-day distinctly understand that we, all of us, appreciate the value and scope of their services, and those of their dead companions.

This war gave us that exquisite verse:

Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood ye gave;
No impious footstep here shall tread
The herbage of your grave;
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While fame her record keeps,
Or honor points the hallowed spot
Where valor proudly sleeps;
On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

THE SOLDIERS OF 1898.

We must not forget the Spanish-American War and its heroes. We must recall the hour when in the dead of night our beloved battleship, torn almost to atoms, sank in the harbor of Havana. We are to recall the thrill of horror and indignation that swept over a Nation of 76,000,000, cementing 15,000,000 men capable of bearing arms in an unalterable determination to remember and avenge the Maine. We must recall the exciting scenes of February, March, and April of 1898, when only the magnificent calmness of McKinley, the calmest of all our Presidents, prevented the American people from rushing unprepared into an unfortunately premature struggle. "Remember the Maine."

We can not come here to-day without doing honor alike to the millionaires' batteries of the East and the Rough Riders of the West; to the valiant warriors whose veins throb with Southern blood; and to the black heroes who intermingled with them in the grand equality of battle. All together they carried the flag up the Cuban slopes; all together they planted it where the Spanish standard had stood for 400 years; all together they forgot all differences; all together they dared and braved death for their united country and the Stars and Stripes. From the roll of honor of this hour we can not omit the names of young Grant and young Lee, of Joe Wheeler and Nelson Miles, the names of Roosevelt, Funston, and Hobson, the names of Schley and Sampson and Dewey; and although this war added only about 3,000 graves to the fifteen hundred thousand of our soldier dead, we can not omit from most honorable mention the home suffering and self-sacrifice of American women, just as universal and unconstrained as it has ever been.

WILL NEVER FORGET.

It would be inexcusable and unpardonable upon this occasion to refrain from mention of all this latter-day heroism and devotion. Illinois will never forget it, nor will you.

Troops the Nation called one day,
Men of valor, strong and steady;
Ere the echo died away
Illinois had answered, "ready."
In the camps and on the ocean,
Braving Cuba's tropic heat,
Proving ever their devotion,
Knowing nothing of defeat.
All they had thus bravely tendered
Here and there death claimed a boy—
Freely, but with tears, surrendered
By the State of Illinois.

THE SOLDIER OF 1918.

Comparatively free from the scourge of war as our Nation has been, there have been nevertheless six great trials by battle of American patriotism. This Decoration Day is distinguished above all similar days of the past in that it witnesses the practical completion of the sixth nation-straining war permitted by Providence in our Nation. The veterans of the old wars are not the only veterans. The "tumult and the shouting" of the old times have recently been reproduced. The far-flung battle line of the Republic reaches to-day not, like the thin blue line of 1865, from Fortress Monroe to the Rio Grande, and not, like the line of 1898, from Cuba to Manila, but from China to Coblenz, Germany.

The mightiest military rally the world ever saw has occurred in our land and time. On one day 10,000,000 American boys marched to the altar of sacrifice. In 17 months—April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918—4,000,000 Americans became soldiers or sailors and 20,000,000 Americans gave their wealth and savings in replies to calls for financial help. All that we had, all that we were, all that we ever expected to be, was at stake. And we knew it.

Of the American victories in the Spanish-American War, the old servant of fighting Bob Evans said "De old Massah above done had something to do with it." I believe God had something to do with this war and America's being drawn into it. After three years of war the nations of Europe were in many respects purified as by fire as never before, and they are to-day, most of them, energized, vitalized, and spiritualized by sacrifice. I believe that God Almighty saw this, and in some celestial council of war on high decided that He would not allow the whole world to be spiritualized and America to be left out. I am unable to explain the German check and retreat at the first battle of the Marne upon any other theory. German generals made mistakes a young American captain would be censured for, and those German generals were the scientific soldiers of the scientific age of this world. They were confounded by the Almighty to prevent the German Kaiser from entering Paris. He was ready, arrayed in tall silver helmet, long velvet cloak of white on his shoulders, high-powered automobile at his right hand, powerful binocular aimed at the Eiffel Tower. Had he won at the Marne and marched that night, September 10, 1917, through the Arch of Napoleon at Paris, the world would have been at his feet—for a time, at least. France would have surely been at his feet, and England substantially so. Then, converting or compelling the navies of the conquered nations to join his own, he would have said, "Westward, ho," for he told our ambassador, James Gerard, that after he had finished with England and France he "would stand no nonsense from the United States." There would have been a hard-fought naval battle, for our Navy would never have surrendered; then one hard-fought land battle, for our 75,000 Regulars and our 225,000 National Guardsmen never would have surrendered. They would all have gone down, drums beating, flags flying, cannon roaring—but wiped out. Then a crowned king would have ridden up Fifth Avenue to this spot, and a crowned king would have occupied Washington, and the tramp of the Prussian regulars would have been heard on Pennsylvania Avenue. From all this we were saved by some one. The "horses and chariots of fire" must have intervened. America was given its chance. It accepted the challenge. In time our boys from shop, and factory, and store, and bank, and mine, and mill faced and fought THE soldiers of the world and whipped them time after time. And so we have a noble list of battle names to add to those which have gone before—Belleau Wood and Argonne Forest, Chateau-Thierry, and Maux, and Grand Pre, and Filmes, Mont Sec, and Montfaucon, and Dead Man's Hill, Verdun, and St. Mihiel, and the Meuse-Argonne—and we have a record by Army and Navy in a thousand different activities worthy of Grant and of the whole sublime and glorious roll of American fighters on land and sea.

And the material and commercial and industrial and financial burdens of this war, gigantic as they are—probably amounting to $50,000,000,000 of our money—all, including $10,000,000,000 loaned to foreign Governments, will be swung as manfully and surely as the military burdens, if we all keep sane. We can not recover by next week or next Christmas. The world has been a very sick world, a very sick world indeed. There must be a convalescence, a convalescent period, a time for recovery, in which signs of recovery appear slowly under wise nursing. If we remain sane, not asking for legislation as a cure-all, and do not rush and push and hurry and worry, we will survive even as the fathers did, survive and get well.

THE "GREAT REBELLION."

THE CIVIL WAR.

But, fellow citizens, the Revolution brought no Decoration Day, the War of 1812 established no permanent memorial custom, and the struggle with Mexico seems to have rendered no such occasion a necessity. Nor are we indebted to the recent World War for our Decoration Day. It was reserved for another controversy—1861–1865—to develop so much havoc of life, to tear such gaps in the ranks of manhood, to harrow so many homes with heartbreak, and to create so much of courage and of patriotism and of zeal as to contribute the main interest to this day and occasion. For this hour the thoughtful elders of this Nation live again in the tumultuous times of 1861.

RUSHING EVENTS.

Visions of fast-rushing events rise to-day in the mind of the middle-aged man. He remembers the preliminary excitement. The country convulsed from day to day by ominous occurrences. This State trembling beneath the mighty blows struck by renowned champions of public opinion. Every community stirred to its foundations in the mighty crisis.

After the passing of 55 years, probably fifteen hundred thousand of the soldiers of the Union are to-day in their graves. We would remember and honor them all; garlands for the humblest as well as for the proudest; blossoms for the nameless as well as for the famous; the latter will not fail of praise, the former we must not forget.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The new President, leaving his Illinois home for the National Capital, is so surrounded by menacing difficulties that he owns his strong mind, courageous heart, and mighty soul to be unequal to the unprecedented task. To his neighbors assembled to bid him farewell he says:

There has fallen upon me a task such as did not rest even upon the Father of his Country, and so feeling I can not but turn and look for that support without which it will be impossible to perform that great task. I turn, then, and look to the great American people and to that God who has never forsaken them.

Grand and sublime figure, how he towers aloft in his pure nobility; how he guided this struggling and suffering country with patient, merciful hand; how he stood like a shield and a bulwark, strong and firm, between the Union and all the perils that assailed it. Fling open the baskets! Pour forth the flowers! Cause his tomb to blush and to quiver and to glow with all the beauty and the loveliness and grace that nature can bestow, and still the spirit of the grand, majestic Lincoln will break from beneath the fragrance, and rising God-like over us reflect the light of a matchless integrity and prudence, and over all that is or will be fair and good in Americanism.

THE GRANDEST VICTORY.

Ladies and gentlemen, you and I know that Abraham Lincoln received the help that he prayed for—received it from 20,000,000 loyal hearts and from the Infinite Power on high. Abraham Lincoln put one hand into the outstretched palm of the American people. With the other he laid a strong hold on the almighty arm of the Almighty God. And standing there, supported by humanity and supported by Divinity, he fought the grandest fight and won the grandest victory the human race has ever seen since the Savior walked amid the sons of men.

THE MEN OF 1861.

But meanwhile the crash comes. A rebellious congress assembles. Confederate armies and legislatures are formed and hot fire is opened upon and against that devoted place, Fort Sumter. The patience of the Union's friends can stand no more. The forbearance of even the Chief Magistrate is exhausted. Sorrowfully he turns from the despairing presence of the angel of peace and reluctantly beckons to the majestic spirit of war. The peaceful people respond as though called to participate in a summer spectacle. Every city and county tenders its company, every district its regiment, every State its batteries. A hundred thousand freemen stand in serried ranks within a fortnight and all doubts are allayed. The safety of the Nation and the protection of the Government are assured. The President, encouraged, telegraphs to the governor of Illinois, who is urging him to accept still more men, "Hold still, Dick, and see the salvation of the Lord."

Christendom stands astounded at the vigor of the struggle and the spirit of the combatants. Educated to believe that its prosperity depends upon slavery, the gallant South rushes to the front to fight against fancied wrong. Convinced by training, tradition, and theology, the North earnestly arms for the fray.

Noble men of sixty-one! Stephen A. Douglas stands in Chicago saying, "Before God, my conscience is clear. I have struggled long for a peaceful solution; the return we receive is war; there are only two sides to this question; there can be no neutrals in this war—only patriots or traitors."

All honor to Stephen A. Douglas. But for him we would have had civil war in Illinois from Cairo north to the doorsteps of Springfield. He put 500,000 men into the Union Army, and 50,000 from Illinois alone.

Peace to his ashes; green be his memory. And all honor to every Douglas follower in that critical hour. They turned the tide. They held the balance of power. They are entitled to honorable mention—every one.

"With malice toward none and charity for all," call after call comes from the Capital for troops. The call is not in vain. Massachusetts sends her noblest, New York puts forth her proudest, Ohio furnishes her bravest, California dispatches her boldest, Illinois forwards her best—Grierson, Ingersoll, Prentiss, and Rawlins; Morrison, McClernand, Palmer, and Black; Sullivan, Singleton, and Lippincott.

And here come all the heroes: Oglesby goes; Grant goes; Logan goes; Howard and Hancock, Sheridan and Sherman; Slocum, Sickles, and Wadsworth; Hooker and Burnside; Thomas and Franklin; hundreds more whose names we know; thousands more whose names are to us unknown; the whole grand, heroic host. Mighty convulsion! The entire continent rocking to and fro! The battle cry of freedom ringing from ocean to ocean! Outbursts of loyalty shaking every Northern Commonwealth! Puritan and pioneer burning with patriotic zeal! "Government of, for, and by the people shall not perish."

WOMAN'S SACRIFICES IN THE REBELLION.

And, ah, let us not forget that there was a parting in a million homes. How often that parting was a parting forever, between sweetheart and lover, between sister and brother, between husband and wife, and between son and mother. Oh, for scarlet geraniums and sweet verbenas and purple violets to strew the graves of the lover and brother! Oh, for pure white jessamine and yellow buttercup and delicate heliotrope so to cover those of the sister and sweetheart as to fully and fittingly express the agony of that parting, the pitiful but unpitied throes of the battle death, and the untold suffering of those ruined, loving lives at home. Oh, for begonia and petunia and hyacinth and fuchsia and lily and rose for the mother and the wife whose son and husband went then from their embraces away, first to the city, further on to the camp, and at last to the nameless mound near the enemy's prison stockade. Sublime sacrifices, glorious and grand, tender and touching, beautiful and blessed. The fragrance of their memory hovers over us to-day like a benediction from the past.

Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood ye gave;
No impious footstep here shall tread,
The herbage of your grave;
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While fame her record keeps,
Or honor points the hallowed spot
Where valor proudly sleeps.
On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread;
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

DISUNION WAS WRONG.

It is right to say and to teach—for we can not fail to perceive—which side was right and which was wrong. It is right and fit that we should never fail to emphasize the fundamental fact that the soldiers of the Union died for the eternal right. We all see and must teach that in the fall of the ramparts of the southern rebellion there melted away the mightiest conspiracy against the rights of man that the world ever saw. It was a conspiracy of intelligence and shrewdness; a conspiracy of refined skill and cultivated ability and signal sagacity; a conspiracy nurtured and fostered with care and with effort. It was an acknowledged attempt to divide the Union, which had been based on the equality of man and the liberty of all and cemented by the shed blood of the forefathers. It was a resort to desperately, by force, erect an abnormal republic with corner stones of slavery; and, worse than all, it lured frank and faithful southern men and gallant and generous southern hearts to lend their aid to the ambitious. The best, truest, and most honest of southerners have fully realized the awful iniquity of the "lost cause," and that any system that gives the lie to the Declaration of Independence and makes the Stars and Stripes an emblem of tyranny should be, and is, doomed to destruction in the infallible providence of Almighty God. I believe that the survivors of the deceived and deluded men who in rank and file fought the battles and filled the cemeteries of the Confederacy have no disposition to dishonor the reconstructed Union or to glorify the treason which they now well know darkened their loved and lovely section.

Congressman HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Dallas, Tex., the son of a Confederate soldier—eloquent son of a valiant sire—showed how fast the remnants of bitterness are dying out by an address he delivered to us in the House of Representatives on Grant's birthday, the 27th of April. I quote from this tribute by a noble son of a noble sire:

"I speak because I am a southern man, because I love my people of the South and am grateful to those who served them in the hour of their distress. In the darkest hour which ever hung its shadows over the Southland, Gen. Grant was the friend of my people and the servant of the highest interest of my Nation. [Applause.] I speak because I love my Nation and its unity, my Nation and its people everywhere. I speak the gratitude of a southern man, and in behalf of my Nation I speak the profound appreciation of one who believes himself to be a patriot, through whose patriotism there runs no line of sectional cleavage. I honor the memory of Grant not only for the magnanimity shown Lee and his army at Appomattox, but when Lincoln had fallen Gen. Grant was the only man in the Nation with the power to defend, who had the purpose and the courage to defend, those who had been the military leaders of the South, those whom the South, bleeding and exhausted, could no longer defend. Lincoln understood, but Lincoln was gone.

"The South was helpless. There were many noble, generous men of position and influence in the North, but there was but one man left in all the broad confines of the Nation who both willed to protect and who had the power to protect my people and preserve for my Nation that thing of inestimable value, the possibility of that to which we have attained to-day—a union not of States held together by words and force merely, but a union of people, of people so united in purpose, in interest, in love for each other, and in loyalty to a common flag that no discord can penetrate their solidarity even to test the strength of the Federal compact. [Applause.] This might have come in some other age, but Grant made that possibility for this generation.

"We southern people recognize Grant as a great general, but it was not in military conflict that he was greatest. Gen. Grant was a great military leader at Appomattox, but he was greater when the battle was over. [Applause.]"

ALL ANIMOSITY ABANDONED.

And the day of animosity upon the part of the North is also, as it should be, forever gone. Let us never again cherish or foster such a feeling. Let us drop the rose of pity upon the grave of the impetuous southern youth. Let us remember that they sprang to the defense of their beloved fatherland only when their loved leaders cried, in the words of their old song, "My Maryland," that "the tyrant's hoof is on the shore." Let us thank God to-day that never again shall there be fraternal war under the dome of the Union sky. When at the age of 6 I saw Jefferson Davis while he was in confinement at Fortress Monroe, I was informed that he would pay for his treason with his life, and all were convinced that he deserved it. Whatever may have been his deserts, I rejoice to-day that the American people displayed the God-like attribute of mercy in his case as well as in all others. That magnanimity astounded the world and must have been heralded with acclaim around the flashing throne where the angels stand. I devoutly believe that God punishes and rewards nations as well as individuals. I believe, as Lincoln did, that God permitted the scourge of war to continue until every cent of the treasure piled up by the bondsman's 250 years of unrequited toil was lost to the South and until every drop of blood drawn by the lash was paid for by another drawn by the sword. And so I also believe that the mercy shown by the Union to the Union's foes at the close of the rebellion has effectually pleaded for this Nation at the mercy seat on high more than once since 1865, for the mighty word of the Maker of the Universe was pledged when he said, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

Ladies and gentlemen, you know the story. After four years of toil and struggle and bloodshed, into the camp of the Army of the Potomac one bright morning walks with quiet manner "the real and genuine spirit of real and genuine war in the person of Ulysses S. Grant," to quote Senator Chauncey M. Depew. Thirty days of tireless attack in Virginia; 30 nights of "By the left flank, march!" Then Richmond is ours and Lee has surrendered, the prisons are thrown open, and the rebel armies are paroled, the Union garrisons are withdrawn, and the bronzed faces are turned homeward, and the parade is on at Washington, and the thousands march down Pennsylvania Avenue before a million wondering lookers-on. At last the endless war has ended, the batteries are silent, the battle fields are deserted, the camp fires are out. With their side arms and their horses the Confederates have gone back to the dust and the ashes of their ruined hearths, and the North begins to resound once more with all the tumult and all the bustle of all the arts of peace.

THE SOLDIERY OF 1861—WHO?

Who were the 300,000 gallant souls who saw their homes no more? They lie to-day upon the distant field. After the passing of 60 years probably fifteen hundred thousand of the soldiers of the Union are in their graves. We should remember and honor them all. We should honor and praise to-day all who went forth to dare and die in that awful time. At their country's call they left partisan zeal, business absorption, and the comforts of home to fight for the American ideal of citizenship. Sovereigns themselves, by divine right, they went forth, every man to defend his own particular kingdom. They were men of reading and thought, almost universally, and every bullet they fired was backed by an intelligent idea. That idea was gained before the war commenced by discussion on the farm and in the workshop, and that discussion was continued everywhere until every man knew exactly why he was fighting and what he was fighting for. Such a soldiery no other nation has ever evolved.

SHALL WE FORGET?

American citizenship came out of the roar and the clash and the smoke and the crash of combat unscathed and unscarred and unblemished. Nay, more—it came out enriched and adorned and embellished and glorified. For this citizenship the war was fought. It was an attribute of our united country. It was an essential organ of our compact body politic. It could not exist in a slave country. The country, as Lincoln believed and predicted, could not exist half slave and half free. Both slavery and this citizenship could not survive. It was because American citizenship was at stake, because American individual liberty hung in the balance, because the Declaration of Independence, with all its achievements and all its principles, was involved in the question, that the determined North faced and fought the fiery South and presented to the world the imposing panorama of 1861 to 1865.

But, fellow citizens, Time heals all wounds, wipes out all old scores, obliterates all scars, mellows all discordant notes. He is passing his erasing fingers over the memories of the recent past. He is effacing the lines drawn by a lately powerful hand. He is applying a soothing balm to feelings fiercely resentful only three decades ago. This is all right. But let him alone and he will complete his work. Oppose him not and the past is an empty dream. Utter no protest and with an enchanting chime of golden bells far up the glittering avenues of a glorious future, luring all to think only of wondrous things to come, he will entice us away from our trophies, from our songs, and even our graves. He will drown out the "music of the boisterous drum and the silver voice of the heroic bugle," and will leave us not a melody, not a note, by which to recall the visions of a past which should be glorious alike to graybeards and to striplings and to Americans yet unborn. We must not permit it.

EDUCATION IN HISTORY.

By educating our youths we can prevent it. All our youths should hear and learn all that patriotism has done for America. The school children can not know too much of the history of freedom. There is room for improvement in this direction. In the city school of to-day, very often, only those children who reach the highest grades or rooms—which can be reached only after six or seven years of study in other books—are taught American history at all. Many children drop out of school and go to work before they reach these grades. In many a country school the close of the annual term finds the children who are studying history only as far along in the study as the events of the Revolutionary War. In many high schools the dead languages and the sciences are taught much more than American history. In many of the 3,000 colleges and academies of the United States a youth receives six and seven years' instruction in the language, literature, biography, and history of Rome and Greece, respectively, and only one year in American history and one year also in American or English literature. Of course, all the great universities furnish complete courses of study in history, but comparatively few go there or get that benefit.

One of the inevitable results is that there are not a few Americans to-day who have not read American history enough, with its glorious facts and names, its dates and figures, to fully realize and appreciate what the veterans of our great wars have done, and to what extent they have preserved our country—our heritage of liberty—and made it what it is.

THE PATRIOTISM OF AMERICAN YOUTH.

I would not for one moment underestimate or disparage the patriotism of our American youth. I have, on many occasions, witnessed its high flaming from thousands of hearts. I believe that an armed attack upon our American free institutions, our civil or religious liberty, or the honor of our beauteous banner of the starlit skies would be answered by a rally of the people fully as grand, fully as resistless, as was that of 50 years ago.

I have no patience with anyone who will suggest, as some do, that if Grant had been killed at Vicksburg the great southern slave conspiracy would have triumphed. In my humble opinion such a triumph was not within the possibilities of Divine Providence. Such a disaster would simply have awakened this country to greater sacrifice, greater valor, and greater retribution than the year 1865 actually saw. God would have raised up another leader. And perhaps the hero of the march to the sea, Sherman, would have been the man; or perhaps it would have been the man who Grant said in 1863 was fitted to command any army, our own brilliant and blessed and beloved John A. Logan; or perhaps it would have been that other dauntless leader who rode down the Shenandoah Valley to glorious victory, even as in after years he rode to the rescue of flame-stricken Chicago, gallant Phil Sheridan. Heaven would not have deserted us. The God of hosts and battles was on our side. And just as I have faith in the inspired patriotism of that time, so I have a supreme and serene faith and confidence in the patriotism of to-day when it shall be called for.

However, I feel sure it would be better far than present arrangements if every school child in the land were taught all that valor has done to establish and perpetuate this Republic, and to make it a Republic resplendent in beauty and grace and power, embracing a continent, free religiously, free civilly, and free politically. Every boy and girl of 15 should know the names and places which have made American bravery famous throughout the world, and which will cause it to blaze in splendor forever in the highest constellation of human achievement. A course of education in history can never be a loss. It will make the American citizen anxious instead of indifferent as to the management of the Government and the progress of the Nation. It will save America from monopoly and Cæsarism; it will save it from socialism and secession; it will save it from centralization; it will save it from dissolution; it will save it from cowardly diplomacy; it will save it from contemptible stinginess; it will save it from avarice and vice and war. It will make us rich and peaceful and contented; it will promote philanthropy and benevolence and generosity; it will help to abolish misery and want and woe; it will help to establish perpetual happiness. We must educate, educate, educate.

PRESERVATION OF OUR MEMORIES.

There is no spot to which the high hopes and boundless aspirations of the coming manhood of our matchless realm can more properly come than to the quiet glen where sleep our fallen brave, or to the printed page, which, with equal silence but with more eloquence, tells of their historic valor. There may be found inspiration for the sublimest work of the loftiest intellect and the most noble aim. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friend." The chivalrous knights of the temple bore upon their streaming banners in crusading times, across the sands of Palestine, a cross and this legend, "In hoc signo vinces"—"By this sign shalt thou conquer"; and by these sacrifices and graves of our soldier dead, by the memories they awaken, and by the daring they inspire we shall conquer time's ruthlessness and youth's thoughtlessness. We will roll back oblivion and lead forgetfulness captive; we will convince ambition and promising hope that there are examples worthy of them all; and we will see to it that the flame of patriotism expires not on our Nation's altars.

I know no better way, fellow citizens, in which we can render to Union soldiers an adequate acknowledgment than by emulation of their devotion as shown by their sacrifices and services. Those who died did not die to secure our compliments. They did not shed their lifeblood to obtain our flowers. They died to make us the freest, manliest, mightiest race in all Christendom. If we fail to cherish, to exalt, and to exemplify the ideal they warred for, we will be guilty of the basest ingratitude. The word or the token we bring and leave here to-day, with all its feeling, all its symbolism, all its beauty, does not crown, does not complete, our duty. We must finish the unfinished work these men laid down after nobly carrying it on as far as it lay in their power to do. Their mortal efforts have ceased, but the influence and spirit of their work and example are with and about us still and afford us the most eloquent inducement and the most powerful incentive to consecrate ourselves with renewed devotion to the glorious cause for which they died—the upbuilding of American nationality, the elevation of American character, the firm establishment of equal rights. We are surrounded and confronted with civic duties. It is not with us now as with our dead. There is no present occasion for our military services; but we have domestic responsibilities and social obligations, duties to the law and to the young, to labor and to commerce, to government and religion, and to the oppressed of the world, which are peculiar to no one of us but applicable to all. If we meet these duties and perform them, doing the right as God gives us to see the right, we will not dishonor our dead. But if corruption rules in our municipal councils; if immorality pervades our society; if hypocrisy disgraces our religion; if treason is preferred to patriotism; if the community honors the dastard above the hero, then these dead men—our soldier dead—are insulted, their memory is mocked, and their graves are dishonored.

I am satisfied that America is doing her best to-day to inculcate and encourage a high type of citizenship. I am firm in the faith to-day that the people of this country are highly resolved never to forget and never to belittle or belie the principles for which our warriors battled and gave up their precious lives. I have great hopes that the citizenship they cherished will be more and more, from year to year, honored and ennobled by their fellow countrymen.

I entertain the profound conviction that their services for their State and Nation have given us all a new birth of freedom and that their grand example will in every hour of need be emulated by the sons of America, though the warlike power of the known world be embattled against her, through all the momentous future.

TO-MORROWS TO COME.

To such old soldiers as may be present to-day let me, in conclusion, say a word in behalf of "young America." In a sense we, like you, are at war. The contest is on with us. Hostile batteries are booming on every side. Enemies are now assailing us. The foes are ignorance and avarice and intemperance and vice. After ignorance is vanquished and labor's rights prevail over corporate avarice, we must cultivate temperance, and we must always at every point along our line and along our march press back vice and crime and fight them desperately with every method at every step. The young generation appeals to you for part of their needed counsel and guidance. Be to them their council of administration. Divide with them the store of your wisdom, your prudence, and your calm, clear judgment. You can help. Your outposts and your sons are in every place of prestige and of power. There are to-morrows to come for you as well as for us. There is vast room yet for the use of your splendid activities. You will yet be with us at least 20 years. Would it could be a hundred. Let us all together, as a people, make them 20 years of victory and progress and prosperity and righteousness unequaled, so that our Nation shall be a national union of American States, far in grandeur and in glory beyond any of fondest anticipations in this the day of constant struggle and the hour of anxious combat. I value your service now, because I know your sacrifice then.

MEMORIES OF FATHER.

The most precious recollection that I have of my father is of how he used to get up and walk the floor at night, forward and back, forward and back, hour after hour, hour after hour, all night long, with wringing hands and streaming eyes and breaking heart, agonizing for some one far away. Before he died, and he died when I was 13 years old, I asked him if those midnight marches really occurred; in other words, whether it was a creation of my own brain. His reply was that it was by no means imagination, that those were "the telegram nights," when telegrams would come in, reading "Great battle to-day; 10,000 killed, wounded, and missing; over half the regiments from Illinois engaged"; that he could not sleep because those suffering ones were his boys, appealed to by him to enlist.

WHY HE WORRIED.

He said: "All over Illinois I begged them to go into the Army, appealing to them for the honor and glory of Illinois and the Stars and Stripes, and they went; and I can see their white faces yet as I appealed to them, and they listened, standing about the platforms in the light cast by the glare of flaring torches; their white faces, I can see them yet; and so when the telegram nights came I could not sleep; that is why I walked the floor many and many a night."

He told me of how he went to his first battle field. He gave his note for a hundred thousand dollars, and with the money thus borrowed from patriotic bankers—patriotic then as patriotic now—he took a steamboat, all filled with nurses and surgeons, with cots and with bandages, with surgical supplies and delicacies for the sick, to that battle field. Upon his arrival, my father, desiring to be the first man to land, started down the gangplank the moment it struck the river bank, but two soldiers started up, and they said, "Here, take this boy," and they threw into my father's outstretched arms a wounded soldier boy, chest all lacerated by a fragment of a shell, right arm hanging only by the shreds of the skin, and my father received the precious burden and turned and staggered up the gangplank with it, and just as he reached the deck of the steamboat proper the boy opened his eyes. And my father said that there was in that boy's look both agony and ecstacy—the agony of the approaching dissolution, the ecstacy of knowing he was giving his young life that liberty might live. And he struggled and said, "Oh, who are you?" "Oh, my boy, I am the governor of Illinois." And that boy said two things; one was "My governor" and the other "Tell mother," and then he died there in those arms in which many others died later.

Oh, sacrifice, sacrifice, the memory of which is like a blessed benediction as long as liberty lives. Who shall say how much that governor's soul was strengthened by that contact? Who shall say how much comfort came to that boy's soul from it?

CONCLUSION.

We are now about to close this wonderful afternoon which we have had together. As we do so, and as we depart from this holy ground to address and devote ourselves to the tasks, the real downright hard work, of life, let us not fail to realize what a privilege it is to our Nation that the Nation has such a place as this and such a man as this (and such men as have been talked about to-day to inspire it) as it turns from this day forward to the great task remaining before it. With this Decoration Day, the first one after the Great War, closes a mighty period and epoch.

In 1837—not 1857 or 1847 but 1837—Abraham Lincoln one day said:

From 1777 to 1837—60 long years—the Nation has thrived and grown great in the visible presence of the surviving heroes and heroines of the Revolution, the very sight of them inspiring us. But now, in 1837, these all are gone, with few exceptions, and the Nation is closing the door upon the heroism of the past, and must now turn and face, without this inspiration, a future which I can not know, and you can not know, and only God himself can foretell.

Even so it is with us now in 1920. For another 60 years—1860 to 1920—we of this day and generation have lived and thrived and grown in the presence of heroism—1861-1865. But the heroes of that time, the jaunty young heroes and the maidens they adored, have been overtaken by the storms and snows of many winters; and they who, eye alight, head erect, soul on high, were the finest, smartest, snappiest soldiers ever seen at any time, in any clime, beneath the shining sun—they are gray to-day and a little bent, a little stooped, a little tired of the long and tedious march, almost ready to say, as the dying Stonewall Jackson said with a last breath:

Let us cross over the river and lie down in the shade of the trees.

Very soon—very, very soon—we who are left will have to close the door and turn to the future without the inspiration we are getting here to-day. Let us highly resolve that we, in our turn, will keep alive the flame of patriotism on the Nation's altar, not forgetting this glorious sight we behold here to-day.

During the Spanish-American War, in the year 1898, a great transport of the United States, bearing 2,000 American soldiers and sailors, left a dock in the Hudson River. It was to be its proud duty to carry those 2,000 boys across the Atlantic, through the Straits of Gibraltar, across the Mediterranean Sea, through the Suez Canal, down into the Red Sea and across the Arabian Sea and the Indian Ocean, and on and on and on, until, in the Pacific, the Philippines should be reached, the first American expedition to go 12,000 miles away from home to overthrow tyranny.

Upon leaving its dock this great ship turned north instead of south and steamed slowly up the Hudson River to this spot. And then, the ship lying still in the middle of the Hudson, a mighty salute was given, peal on peal and roar on roar of heavy artillery saluting the silent commander lying here. And then, while colors dipped and drums rolled and bugles sang, 2,000 American boys froze into the salute, every eye resting upon this temple. It is safe to say that not a single boy ever forgot that hour. How appropriate it was that that salute should be accomplished before those boys went forth—went forth with the Stars and Stripes folded over their hearts and the image of U. S. Grant in their imaginations.

May the memory of this occasion, this white temple, the tall angels of white marble surrounding our heroic dead, the brightness of the sunlight, the singing of the birds, the harmony of the strains of music, the sweetness of the old war songs—may this memory go with us from this place and hour and abide with us like a blessed benediction, so that in all the momentous future no evil may triumph over our beloved land, the beautiful, healthful, resourceful, helpful, "land of the free and home of the brave."

Our country first, our glory and our pride;
Land of our faith, land where our fathers died;
When in the right, we'll see thy honor bright;
When in the wrong, we'll die to set thee right.

Our Undeveloped Resources and the Nation's Food Supply.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. SUMMERS,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the crying need of to-day is greater production. In response the farmers of this country have driven the plow deeper and further than ever before in our history, but still the world cries for food and prices have continued to soar. Such conditions, we are told, are going to continue for years to come, but whether or not the demand maintains its present intensity I believe it is the clear, economical duty of our Government to continue to reclaim and assist in the development of our vast expanses of arid land in the West, thousands of acres of which already bear abundant testimony to the wisdom of the great reclamation movement.

It is true that present high prices will probably not prevail permanently, but before they came to pass, as a result of war conditions, there was great need for increased production, great need for more land on which our increasing population could build homes. Right now our cities are overpopulated and as industrial conditions gradually relax and the 1920 census figures again reveal the necessity of another "back-to-the-farm" movement we may too late discover a lack of foresight in not reclaiming even larger areas of our idle arid lands of the West than is now planned—lands that, where water is once secured, are transformed from deserts to fertile fields with luxuriant crops that wave a beckoning hand to the tiller of the soil.

SKEPTICISM STILL PREVAILS.

Mr. Speaker, there are some Members of the House, in addition to the gentleman from Missouri, who will agree with what I have just stated in regard to the need for greater production and the desirability of getting more land into cultivation, thus increasing our crops and our commerce, but these gentlemen are skeptical as to the results of reclamation work and will want to be shown. Just why this still remains true, after all that has been accomplished and the many convincing examples of success, I do not understand. Perhaps there has not yet been enough testimony given, and while I do not deign to speak for the entire West, though a member of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, I do desire to call particular attention to the past history and future hopes of reclamation work in the State of Washington, and I might add that the reclamation history of this State is also the reclamation history of the West.

Mr. Speaker, the value of the crops harvested in the Yakima Valley last year is conservatively estimated, according to reliable figures which I shall shortly quote in detail, at $45,602,576, and I am here to say that had it not been for the passage of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and the subsequent reclamation work in that valley by our Government, the value of its crops last year would have been reduced about $40,000,000.

Here, then, we have a concrete example of forty millions in one year added to the country's production and wealth as a result of Federal reclamation work on the arid lands of one county in my district. Visit the Yakima Valley and investigate for yourself.

YAKIMA CROPS IN DETAIL.

In presenting a statement of the 1919 production in the Yakima Valley every care has been taken to assure accuracy, and where some doubt exists a low estimate is made.

The total value reaches the vast sum of $45,602,576, but great as the aggregate is it does not correctly nor completely cover the amount of farm products actually raised within the valley.

One instance of this is the alfalfa yield. Careful estimates, based on 100,000 acres, place the total alfalfa crop in the valley at 400,000 tons, valued, roughly, at $8,250,000. Fully one-third of this will be fed to home live stock, will be represented in 1920 values, and is therefore not included in the statement below.

The same conditions apply to corn. While only 55 cars were shipped, the total yield is at least 17,360 tons or 868 cars, valued at $819,000. There were in excess of 10,000 acres planted to corn in the valley.

Several new items enter into the 1919 report not previously included. Nursery stock raised and sold yielded $750,000; clover seed brought fully $500,000; mixed fruit by parcel post aggregated $250,000.

If an attempt were made to show the actual value of things produced, whether shipped or not, the 1919 report would easily exceed $50,000,000. The following table of values, however, represents largely money already brought in and expended through various channels.

A total of 31,850 carloads of produce raised in the Yakima Valley last year have rolled to market. Under group headings the record shows the crops and values in detail, as follows:

Number cars.
	FRESH FRUIT.
50	Strawberries, 27,500 crates, at $3.50	$96,250
75	Cherries, 600 tons, at 12½ cents	150,000
140	Plums and prunes, at $1,600	224,000
9,904	Apples, each 756 boxes, at $2	14,974,848
2,000	Pears, each 544 boxes, at $2	2,176,000
2,200	Peaches, each 1,211 boxes, at 62½ cents	1,665,125
250	Mixed fruit, at $1,000	250,000
300	Cantaloupes, 120,000 crates, at $2.25	270,000
100	Watermelons, 1,800 tons, at $25	45,000
250	Mixed fruit, express, at $1,000	250,000
250	Mixed fruit, parcel post, at $1,000	250,000
40	Grapes, 3,500 baskets, at 30 cents	42,000
15,559	Total raw fruit	20,393,223
	VEGETABLES.
150	Onions, 2,700 tons, at $60	162,000
20	Turnips, 300 tons, at $32	9,600
15	Green corn, at $750	11,250
20	Carrots, 300 tons, at $25	7,500
20	Rutabagas, 300 tons, at $30	9,000
12	Cabbage, 180 tons, at $55	9,900
5	Asparagus, 100,000 pounds, at 10 cents	10,000
75	Tomatoes, 97,500 crates, at 70 cents	66,500
5	Green peppers, 120,000 pounds, at 5 cents	6,000
20	Squash, 300 tons, at $32	9,600
15	Pumpkin, 300 tons, at $30	9,000
25	Beans, 500 tons, at 5 cents per pound	50,000
	Garden truck, miscellaneous	50,000
1,800	Potatoes, 29,000 tons, at $40; 7,000 tons, at $65	1,635,000
2,182	Total raw vegetables	2,045,350
	HAY.
14,000	Alfalfa, 182,000 tons, at $23	4,186,000
3,480	47,250 tons fed in transit, at $18	850,500
150	Alfalfa meal, at $900	135,000
17,630	Total hay value	5,171,500
	GRAINS.
525	Wheat, each 1,200 bushels; 630,000 bushels, at $2.10	1,323,000
80	Barley, each 30 tons; 2,400 tons, at $58	139,200
75	Oats, each 30 tons; 2,250 tons, at $58	130,500
55	Corn, each 20 tons; 1,100 tons, at $45	49,500
735	Total grain	1,642,200
	SUGAR BEETS.
416	Sugar, 125,000 bags, at $10.50	1,312,500
15	Beet pulp, wet; 15,000 tons, at 80 cents	12,000
431	Total sugar beets	1,324,500
	LIVE STOCK.
1,000	Sheep, at $2,522	2,522,000
270	Hogs, at $3,250	877,500

476	Total fruit and vegetable products	1,839,500
31,850	Grand total	45,602,576

The Yakima storage unit will place under the ditch 270,000 acres of adjacent lands and will nearly double these figures.

OTHER PROJECTS BECKONING.

These are the accomplishments of irrigation in the Yakima Valley, but there are other equally promising areas of arid land in my district which are mutely appealing for water, so that they may join in the great work of feeding our people, for which they were by nature intended but restricted by some freak of volcanic action.

Two great river systems—the Snake and the Columbia—are tributary to these lands and these projects, so that the water supply is unlimited. All that is needed is the will of Congress and the hand of engineering science.

The latter is now being applied by the Reclamation Service in investigations which are proving the feasibility of the work proposed. Soon all that will remain to be done will be the approval of adequate appropriations which will be returned manyfold by the increase of our agricultural wealth and commerce.

Permit me to call your attention to the major projects contemplated, most all of which have already been investigated and indorsed by the Reclamation Service.

THE LOWER SNAKE PROJECT.

The Lower Snake River project contemplates a dam across the Snake River at the Five Mile Rapids and the irrigation of 60,000 acres of land near Burbank and 60,000 acres near Pasco, Wash.

This is wonderfully productive soil when the water is applied, as is already well demonstrated by small tracts in this district, which has a longer growing season than any other in the Northwest. When water is applied crop yields of alfalfa, corn, berries, vegetables, and fruits are unusually abundant.

The Washington State reclamation service has approved of this project and is cooperating with the United States Reclamation Service in final investigations. It is proposed to construct a dam across the Snake River at Five Mile Rapids and thus build a huge reservoir.

Only one important question was raised, and that was whether a feasible dam site could be found. In this investigation the Federal and the State Reclamation Services joined, and the result was the official agreement that the dam was entirely feasible. Soil surveys have also been made and found satisfactory.

The only thing now needed is governmental action and another vast area of arid land will be added to our fertile fields of plenty.

Five railroads would serve this project by lines now actively engaged in regular business. The Snake and Columbia Rivers, which merge near here, will soon both be bridged by fine new structures, one under course of construction by the counties and the other also under way by a construction engineer who has secured rights for a toll bridge.

Here, then, are 120,000 acres of land, now almost barren, that will repeat the lesson of the Yakima Valley, which I have already emphasized.

THE KENNEWICK HIGH-LINE PROJECT.

The Kennewick high-line project, lying in the lower Yakima Valley, will water 35,000 acres of the best dry land in the State. Private irrigation of lands immediately adjoining has also demonstrated beyond question the productiveness of these lands.

The Reclamation Service has already approved this project, and it now only awaits an appropriation, which I have no doubt will be forthcoming soon.

KITTITAS VALLEY PROJECT.

The Kittitas Valley—the far-famed alfalfa lands of the Northwest—have proven their merit during a third of a century under private irrigation. There are still 70,000 acres awaiting water. Under the title of the Kittitas High Line, this project has also been approved for development by the Reclamation Service.

Both it and the Kennewick project will rival the results obtained in the Yakima Valley.

THE HORSE HEAVEN PROJECT.

No résumé, however brief, of the undeveloped lands of southeastern Washington would be complete without due consideration of that vast area known as Horse Heaven, which extends from Prosser to Kennewick and far into Klickitat County. Here are more than 200,000 acres of land, beautifully situated.

This vast area, one time the happy winter pasture land of the Cayuse, will some day be irrigated and will supply food for tens of thousands of American citizens.

But this is not all. There is yet another project which is an empire in itself, and which when completed will eclipse anything yet attempted in reclamation work and stand as a monument to the ingenuity of man working hand in hand with nature.

I refer to the great—

COLUMBIA BASIN PROJECT.

This project covers areas in Adams, Franklin, Grant, Spokane, and Walla Walla Counties, and possibly some territory in Oregon.

The total irrigable area is 1,750,000 acres of first-class land, two-thirds of which is or has been in wheat.

All the lands lie below an elevation of 1,600 feet above sea level, and the soil and climate are the same as in the Yakima Valley.

The drainage features are ideal, an unusual condition in large irrigation projects. This makes unnecessary the construction of extensive drainage works.

The water supply is from the Pend Oreille River, which has an average yearly run-off of 19,000,000 acre-feet.

The intake of the project would be at Albany Falls, about 2 miles east of Newport, and the gross amount of water diverted would be 6,250,000 acre-feet. Water duty required on land varies from 24 to 48 inches.

The amount of storage water required is 2,400,000 acre-feet to be held in Flathead Lake, with 1,000,000 acre-feet in Lake Pend Oreille. The secondary storage on the project would be sufficient to provide equalization and regulation of flow. The main supply would come from Albany Falls on the Pend Oreille River in Idaho, to Hillcrest, Wash., total 130 miles, of which lakes constitute 40 miles.

RIVALS PANAMA CANAL.

Rivaling the Panama Canal in magnitude is this proposal to irrigate the 1,750,000 acres of arid but very fertile land lying between the Bitterroot Mountains and the Columbia River in eastern Washington. A great part of the area proposed to be watered now gives meager sustenance to hordes of jack rabbits and is covered by great stretches of pungent sage brush.

Unlike the Panama Canal, however, the plan to place life-giving water on an arid portion of the State does not present baffling engineering problems. Reclamation engineers years ago investigated a proposal to water the arid plans embraced within the Columbia Basin. The plan was not acted upon because it was considered in those comparatively early days of the Pacific Northwest that the undertaking was too extensive for immediate consideration.

Conditions have changed materially since the first reconnaissance. The rapid settlement of available agricultural lands in the West, the lack of sufficient rainfall in dry-farming regions, and the vast returns in the aggregate from irrigated sections have focused attention upon the desirability of extending irrigation wherever water can be found available. All the engineering data gathered by the engineers for the Columbia Basin survey commission goes to confirm the early findings of Government engineers.

The irrigable area in the Columbia Basin is composed of volcanic ash and decomposed basalt, elements which promote vigorous and rapid growth of crops. This entire basin, we are told by engineers, was covered in a past geological age by what moderns have named Lake John Day, into which streams of mud were poured and volcanoes spewed vast quantities of fine white dust and lapilli. Lake John Day broke through the barrier of the Cascades at Cascade Locks and left the Columbia River to drain the great rich basin.

WOULD MAKE HOMES FOR HALF A MILLION.

It is proposed to place on these broad streaches from 2 to 4 feet of water annually and to convert the sage-brush plains into alfalfa fields, orchards, and small diversified farms where a population of more than half a million producers may establish homes and independence.

A large part of this area has been planted to wheat, but because of insufficient rainfall for a number of years it has yielded only scant crops. Much of the land has been allowed to revert to its natural arid condition.

The land to be placed under irrigation in the Columbia Basin will require annually from 24 to 48 inches of water per acre, or, in round numbers, 5,000,000 acre-feet. Without imparing the minimum flow of the Pend Oreille River, the source of supply, more than sufficient water can be taken from the stream to irrigate the entire area and leave a surplus at the lowest recorded year of 6,000,000 acre-feet. The Pend Oreille River has an average yearly water run-off of 19,000,000 acre-feet.

By constructing a dam at Flathead Lake in Montana, one of the largest inland bodies of water in the United States, a storage reservoir for 2,400,000 acre-feet of water will be created. A second dam at Albany Falls, Idaho, will create storage in Lake Pend Oreille for an additional 1,000,000 acre-feet, so there would be no cause for worrying about the water supply.

From the diversion point at Albany Falls, a maximum flow of 20,000 second-feet will be delivered to the main canal during the irrigation season.

The great plain of the Columbia River from a climatic standpoint is ideal for growing diversified crops. The soil and climatic conditions are similar to those in the Yakima Valley. The long summer period of almost continuous sunshine, the comparatively low altitude, mild winters, the absence of violent storms, unsurpased soil conditions, and length of growing season make for abundant crops, provided sufficient water is placed on the land.

VAST AREA IS INCLUDED.

The arid, treeless basin rises in a gradual slope from 400 feet at the Columbia River to 1,700 feet at Hillcrest. On the great plateau picturesque low mountains rise in the northern portion while the Blue Mountains extend from the Oregon line into the southeast portion and the high Cascades form the western boundary.

Over the central Washington plain, and particualrly in Douglas, Grant, Franklin, and Yakima Counties, there is a great preponderance of dry air and clear sky with scanty precipitation of both rain and snow, the mean annual amounts ranging from 6 to 7 inches in the very arid districts to 11 and 12 inches in the northern, eastern, and western parts of the semiarid area.

In the mountainous portions of the northern and southern counties and on the Cascades to the west there is very heavy snowfall, while on the intervening plateau snow seldom covers the ground throughout the entire winter, and in many of the valleys it lasts for only a week or so at a time. Over the so-called dry-farming wheat belt the total annual precipitation ranges from 12 to 18 inches.

Only in exceptional seasons, however, have farmers in the arid area harvested profitable crops, the lack of moisture making agriculture a hazardous undertaking on these particular lands. On the other hand, the Yakima Valley, with the same character of soil and climate, under irrigation has produced fruit and diversified crops to an average value of $161 per acre. The value of crops from the Yakima Valley in 1919 is estimated above at $45,000,000 produced on a cultivated area of about 300,000 acres, and Yakima has still other areas of land on which water is to be obtained and which will still further add to her agricultural values.

SOME STARTLING FIGURES.

On the same basis, all things being equal, the Columbia Basin, under irrigation and developed to the same point as Yakima, would return an annual yield of more than $150 per acre. The total value of improved land in the three counties of Adams, Franklin, and Grant, as equalized by county commisioners in 1918, is only $17,629,976 as against an assessed valuation of Yakima County in 1919 of $39,440,295.

The average value of unimproved lands in the three dry counties as equailzed by county boards in 1918 was $3.70 per acre. In Yakima County sage brush or unimproved lands were equalized by the county board at $2.43 per acre. Irrigation lands in the Yakima Valley have been readily sold at prices ranging from $180 to $250 per acre for unimproved farm lands and from $350 to $1,000 and even $2,000 per acre for improved orchard lands.

The Yakima Valley is a growing product of irrigation. A sage-brush plain, unyielding to anything except water, has there been converted into one of the most fertile and productive agricultural districts in the world, and only a part of the area proposed to be irrigated has been placed under water. Its future is more promising as water is extended to the arid plains beyond the cultivated orchards and fields.

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES.

Within the area proposed to be irrigated in the Columbia Basin, five great railway systems, the Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co., and the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway Co., with their several branch lines, give transportation outlets to big Pacific coast terminals.

Well-graveled State and county highways and some hard-surfaced roads cross and recross a great portion of the Columbia Basin, and the various projects enumerated above, affording ready ingress and egress for horse and motor transportation; and in several instances counties have bonded themselves for more hard-surfaced roads.

The Columbia River also offers a direct outlet to Portland and the Pacific Ocean for the products of this great inland arid area. With the rapid growth of population in Pacific coast cities, such as Seattle, Portland, and Tacoma, with an ever-decreasing local fresh-food supply, the construction and development of the Columbia Basin project, with all its allied projects, will mean greatly increased traffic by railroads and by water; greater jobbing possibilities; enlarged manufacturing, and unlimited commercial and agricultural growth for the Pacific Northwest.

WOULD FEED A MILLION PEOPLE.

In this and the other smaller projects, all lying in southeastern Washington, there are altogether 2,500,000 acres of land. It is safe to say that the crop yield from this vast, undeveloped empire, now traversed by many railways and hard-surfaced highways, and dotted with scores of thriving towns and villages, would, when watered, feed a population of a million souls.

The rising tide of food prices and the millions of hungry mouths all over the world should focus attention on these undeveloped resources of the Northwest.

As a business proposition for the Federal Government, these projects should appeal to the lawmakers of America.

Actual demonstration on adjacent lands will prove beyond doubt that this entire area of dry land, now almost valueless, will, with three crops, repay the Government every dollar that may be expended.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I beg of you that you lay aside your prejudices and preconceived notions and see the facts as they are.

Contrast—The Federal Reserve Act and Republican Failure.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL F. PHELAN,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 2, 1920.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, the United States for some months past has been, and for many months ahead will be, passing through a critical period of readjustment and reestablishment as a natural consequence of the most stupendous, most destructive, and most disorganizing war in history.

The end of the war saw all the great nations of the world, including our own, facing social, political, economic, and financial problems of such magnitude and complexity as to incite despair of their proper solution were it not for an abiding faith in the conquering power of human endeavor.

This country was better prepared to face such problems than were the European nations, because we had suffered less from the shock and disorganization of war and were in better economic condition and had vastly greater resources at our command. The very fact that we were better prepared imposed upon us a greater obligation than upon those less fortunately fortified to accomplish our task efficiently, and charged us with a greater responsibility, not alone to ourselves but to the whole world, in the readjustment of world conditions than could be charged upon peoples without our great resources and reserves.

While it is true that the American people as a whole had imposed upon them heavy obligations in the great work of rehabilitation, they had a right to look to the Executive and to Congress, their chosen representatives, to lead the way, and with steadfastness in purpose, wisdom in construction, and courage in execution perform the various governmental functions which would clear the way of entanglements and obstructions and prepare the path for the onward march toward reconstruction.

REPUBLICAN OPPORTUNITY.

The Republican Party took control of Congress at the dawn of the reconstruction period. Before it lay a field of extraordinary natural fertility, but a field whose fertility was temporarily checked because of various obstructions and rank growths. With these obstructions and growths removed, this field gave promise of a resumption of former abundant production. To the Republican Party for the time were intrusted the destinies of the United States, a country of almost limitless resources, a country capable of producing boundless wealth. The ravages and disorganization of war had thrown obstacles in the way of development and production of wealth. The first step toward a resumption of former and ever-increasing prosperity must be taken by the National Congress in the removal of those obstructions which hindered progress.

A burdensome war tax specially designed for war times had been necessarily and properly placed upon the American people and had been generally borne by them with complacency while the war lasted. In peace times, however, readjustment of heavy taxes became necessary to avoid hindrance or discouragement in the forward movement toward speedy economic recovery.

High prices for commodities and necessaries were a natural accompaniment of the destructiveness, diminution of production, and general inflation of war, but still higher prices threatened to become onerous beyond endurance unless checked and controlled in peace times. A demand far beyond supply offered a fertile field to the seeker for extortionate profit and profiteering became rampant. The duty of dealing with the reduction of the cost of living and of curbing the profiteer was plainly imposed upon the Congress of the United States.

The dislocation of our great railroad systems and their general disorganization because of the war created the great problem for Congress to solve of laying the foundations for the rejuvenation and development of our transportation organizations, the great arteries of commerce. The initiative in the upbuilding and development of a great merchant marine could be taken only by Congress. It bore a heavy obligation to establish, and establish at once, a sound policy relative to American shipping.

The decrease in coal production had brought about a serious menace to the maintenance of our great industrial production. So serious has this matter become that already from various parts of the country, especially from New England, has come a cry of alarm and foreboding as to the desperate conditions which may exist in industrial centers for want of coal next winter.

One of the most appalling situations which confronted us was the ever growing tendency toward decrease in our agricultural products. To what more important problem could statesmen give their attention than to the maintenance and development of agriculture, the very corner stone of our national prosperity?

The mention of these few problems is enough to suggest without enumeration the many other questions to which the Republican Congress should give heed. There was a great task to be accomplished; there was a great opportunity presented, which would have been embraced eagerly by statesmen if statesmen had been in control. There was a great national service to be rendered, and it was within the power of a properly constituted Congress to render it efficiently and fully.

REPUBLICAN FAILURE.

How has this Republican Congress discharged its responsibilities? Republicans are wont in platform declarations and elsewhere to glorify past accomplishments. How much better it would have been for the Republican Party and for our country itself if the Republican Party in this Congress had so conducted itself and had so discharged its responsibilities that Republicans of future generations could point back with pride to the legislative accomplishments of this Republican Congress. But, alas, they shall be forever denied that gratification, for the Republican Party has failed, and failed lamentably, in the fulfillment of its obligations.

It has done nothing for taxation reform, in spite of the President's insistent demand. It has passed through the House so-called tariff bills, placing a tariff duty upon some half dozen or more articles. These bills passed the House, but were not even seriously considered by the Republican Senate. They were manifestly a bid for political votes in certain congressional districts. The Republican conception, therefore, of a discharge of its obligation in taxation reform consisted in the passage through the House of a few popgun tariff bills which it was known would not become law. This and nothing more.

As to the problem of high cost of living, investigations galore have been made, speeches and charges without number have been made on the floor of the House, but not even has serious attempt been made in constructive way to deal with the problem by the Republican Congress. The President's recommendations have been ignored. A single instance will suffice to demonstrate Republican methods. Sugar and the price of sugar have been talked about incessantly, but Congress has not initiated a single movement to reduce the price of sugar nor to increase the production nor to enlarge the supply. The record of the Republican Party relative to the problem of high cost of living is a blank page.

Profiteering continues its arrogant course without let or hindrance from the Republican Congress. Again the President's recommendations have been ignored.

As to the railroad problem, does anyone contend that the bill which has been enacted into law gives promise of being anything more than a makeshift? What new constructive idea is contained in a single one of its many provisions? Its failure to take rank as a great or efficacious measure is perhaps best indicated by oft-repeated remarks of Republicans themselves, "Well, it was the best we could get under the circumstances."

The merits of the shipping bill can be sufficiently measured by recalling the fact that the conference committee in its attempt to get a bill through was repeatedly repudiated through the aid, indeed, of Republican votes, and it was only in the last days of Congress that any kind of a bill could be forced through. Again the opportunity for true constructive work was let slip by.

As to the all-important question of coal production, not even an effort has been made to meet the situation. If, next winter, industry is interfered with, factories closed, and men thrown out of employment through lack of fuel the Republican Party will have the consolation of knowing that these things happened after election.

No effort has been made to stimulate agricultural production nor even to maintain it where it is. What a contrast with the record of the Democratic Party in Congress which passed so many effective measures affecting the farmer, notably one of the greatest constructive measures ever enacted into law in this country, the farm-loan act.

The great problems relating to labor, affecting as they do our whole national welfare, have received scanty or no notice from this Republican Congress.

A complete indictment of the failure of this Republican Congress would be too long to be drawn up in the statement I am making. Timidity, however, and evasion, vacillation, lack of vision, subordination of legislative responsibilites to political aspirations; lack of unity, lack of cohesion within the party itself, and absence of strong leadership; but most of all a startling and complete failure to comprehend the fundamental principles to be applied to meet the crisis through which we are passing, to discern the peril to our agricultural and commercial stability which threatens us, to perceive the danger of reaction and ruinous depression standing before us—these characteristics have stamped themselves indelibly upon the Republican Party, which has had control of this Congress.

In the failures of this Congress we are reminded by way of contrast with what can be done by legislators capable of meeting big problems with courage, confidence, wisdom, and vision, and with a steadfast purpose to serve the public.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

That great legislative act, known as the Federal reserve act, immediately presents itself to our minds. The Federal reserve act was passed by the Democratic Sixty-third Congress in the incredibly short space of nine months after convening. The committee members who framed it and the Members of the Democratic Congress which passed it must have been possessed of a persistent courage to enact this bill in view of the ceaseless and bitter fight made against its passage by the most powerful financial interests in the country. This fight on the part of the so-called big interests never ceased until after the President had actually affixed his signature to the bill. It required a confidence based upon knowledge to pass the bill through both Houses in the face of the dire predictions of disaster sure to follow its passage made by leading banking interests and others whose word had hitherto been taken as gospel. Happily, the prophets of disaster, the unrelenting foes of the Federal reserve act, have come to acknowledge their error, and in recognition of the virtue of this act have joined in the universal acclaim of praise for this legislative achievement. It required vision not alone to make adequate provision for every demand, ordinary and extraordinary, of peace times, but also for the stupendous demands of the most costly and complexly financed war in history.

One of the essential secrets, perhaps the essential secret, of its success in enactment and secret of its virtue lies in the truth that it was dedicated not to the powerful and big banking and financial interests of the country, nor to any other special interest, but to the whole people of the Nation. In this it differed fundamentally and everlastingly from the so-called Aldrich bill, the Republican measure. In so many essential and underlying principles does the Federal reserve act differ from the Aldrich bill that attempts by Republican orators to connect the two measures with a purpose of bestowing some reflected credit on the Aldrich bill ought perhaps to be treated in a spirit of humor only.

There is, indeed, an element of humor in their futile effort when we recall that Nelson Aldrich himself, the father of the Aldrich bill, severely denounced and unreservedly condemned the Federal reserve act. I have his speech now in my possession. Aldrich himself condemned the Federal reserve act, and now Republican orators on this floor would have us believe that he is entitled to reflected credit for the creation of this act which he denounced.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT AND THE ALDRICH BILL.

The Aldrich bill provided for a single central banking institution, and further provided for the control of the system by the bankers. The Federal reserve act made provision for the institution of a decentralized banking system through the establishment of 12 Federal reserve banks scattered throughout the country, with ample provision, however, for the unification of the various parts of the system so far as was necessary and beneficial; and, furthermore, provided for governmental control through the creation of a Federal Reserve Board, every member of which was to be appointed by the President and accountable not to bankers but to the people of the United States.

For the edification of my Republican colleagues who struggled for reflected glory for their party, I might add that a not unimportant difference is that the Federal reserve act enjoys actual and vigorous existence as an enacted law, useful and beneficent, while the Aldrich bill is a discarded, discredited bill, harmless solely because of its failure of enactment. That the Aldrich bill is dead is due to the fact that in its complete centralization of financial power and in its bankers' control it portended such a menace to national welfare that not even the well-disciplined organization of the Republican Party could compel all party members to support it. What a contrast to the Federal reserve act, whose merit was so great as to compel the support during its passage of a not inconsiderable number of Republican Members.

In its decentralization the Federal reserve act eliminated the danger always attendant upon too great centralization, a danger especially grave in connection with financial centralization; and furthermore gave to the various sections of the country local banking institutions familiar with local needs and fortified to meet such needs. There was thus embodied in the act an old-time Democratic principle in striking contrast with the special-interest policy which was a part of the Aldrich bill.

WHAT THE ACT ACCOMPLISHED.

Its passage came at a fortuitous time, for, after the necessary delay in preparing for its institution, it was organized as a living system at about the same time that the great European war broke out.

What the country would have done to sustain the great shock of that war to our financial, industrial, and agricultural structure and the subsequent upheaval attendant upon our own entrance into the war is simply conjecture as to the limit and extent of the tragic consequences sure to befall our Nation.

Providentially we did have a Federal Reserve System which was not only to meet every demand, to supply every need both private and governmental, to rise to every emergency, and to overcome every crisis, but which was also to operate as a solid rock fundation upon which to build our stupendous war organization. Confidence was a vital factor in our capacity to plan, organize, develop, and achieve, a vital factor in our ability to overpower tremendous obstacle. That we had boundless confidence was due to the conviction that we had, at the basis of our whole structure, a financial foundation, the Federal reserve act, which was unshakable in its strength and practically unlimited in its reserve power.

The first demand upon its sustaining power occurred just after the European war broke out, and indeed before the system was actually in operation. The sudden shock of the war, the hasty withdrawal by Europeans of funds from our banking institutions, the coincident withdrawal of funds by our own people through apprehension and other connecting causes made a demand upon our banking institutions which seriously threatened their stability. Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo acted with instant promptitude. In cooperation with the Federal Reserve Board and leading bankers of the country, steps were taken for the immediate issuance of ample currency to meet every demand for withdrawal of funds. A section of the Federal reserve act extending the life of a former congressional act made this possible.

The anticipation of the prompt subsequent establishment of the 12 Federal reserve banks gave conclusive assurance that the temporary measures hastily taken to meet the situation could be taken with the utmost safety. A most serious financial crisis, perhaps a panic, was averted, although scarcely a handful of our people ever knew that even a suggestion of trouble threatened.

Almost coincident with this event a desperate situation arose in the cotton States. Approximately 60 per cent of our cotton crop is exported. The outbreak of the European war, with its interference to shipping and industry and the subsequent closing of cotton exchanges in the United States and in England, left the cotton grower and cotton distributor prostrate. Again Secretary McAdoo acted with decision and with wisdom. Again working in conjunction with the Federal Reserve Board, New York bankers, clearing houses in other parts of the country, and bankers in cotton States, a cotton settlement fund of $135,000,000 was established and administered under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board. This fund was established in reliance upon the support of the Federal Reserve System. It afforded sufficient credit, and vitally necessary credit, to the cotton interests, but particularly the cotton growers. It saved the situation. Distress almost to the point of ruin which threatened the South was speedily avoided. If the threatened catastrophe to the cotton States had not been averted, the effects would have been grave all over the country, for so large a section of our country could not suffer overwhelming depression without most serious consequences to every other section. The Federal reserve act, therefore, thus early was giving evidence of its efficacy.

As the European war continued, new problems, new difficulties, and new demands kept arising in relation to our financial operations. Shortly after the outbreak of the war there was a cessation of exports, to be followed later on by a steady increase in exports, until finally our export trade assumed huge proportions. This unanticipated increase in the volume of export trade had to be financed. The demand for American products, manufactured products in particular and war material most of all, stimulated a tremendous increase in our industrial production. Funds and credit were necessary for plant extensions, for material, for labor, and for everything else entering into production. Again there must be adequate provision for financing. Enough has been said to suggest the new and sudden and voluminous demands that were made and were being constantly made upon our banking institutions as a result of the European war. With an inadequate banking and currency system such demands could not possibly have been met, and financial disorder, perhaps financial panic, would have enveloped the Nation. Our old national banking system could hardly have withstood the strain. The lack of cohesiveness and unity among our national banks, a feature which was inherent in the national banking system, would of itself have been sufficient to invite disaster. The Federal Reserve System, however, was in full operation. It was a system of exceeding strength and of ample reserve power. Apart from any help or accommodation it actually afforded member banks, it enabled, by its very existence, individual banks of the country to meet every legitimate demand made upon them in full confidence that they could pay out cash or extend credit in far greater volume than ever before with full safety, because the Federal Reserve System stood behind ready and prepared to give support when necessary with its extraordinary sustaining power.

During the period extending from the outbreak of the European war to our own entrance into the war, trade, commerce, and agriculture were carried on in a constantly increasing volume, but always with amply sufficient funds and credit available. During this trying period, thanks to the Federal reserve act, the business of the country was unhampered by the slightest financial upset, and not even the suggestion of financial disturbance for a single instance disquieted the minds of our people.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT AND THE WAR.

The period of our own participation in the Great War was the period during which was to be demonstrated in its fullness the marvelous strength, capacity for service, and sustaining power of the Federal Reserve System. Never before in the history of mankind was any country called upon to assume financial obligations so huge in volume as was the United States during the war and subsequent thereto. In addition to the vast sums raised by taxation the Treasury issued Liberty bonds to the amount of $16,937,490,850 and Victory notes to the amount of $4,495,014,226. Thus over $21,000,000,000 of United States bonds and notes were issued by the Government and absorbed by the country in a period covering approximately only two years. Within the same period over $9,000,000,000 was loaned European and other countries by this Government. In addition to this, United States certificates of indebtedness issued in anticipation of Government loans or collection of taxes were put out and absorbed. The amounts of these certificates outstanding at any one time varied, but on May 5, 1919, in attaining their highest point, these certificates were outstanding to the amount of $6,467,525,000.

The whole people of the Nation responded promptly and patriotically in the flotation of Government bonds, notes, and certificates. Without their enthusiastic and self-sacrificing support, our bond flotations would not have been a success, and serious difficulties would have arisen in the financing of the war. In spite, however, of the noble response of our American people, it is beyond conception how the war could have been successfully financed if it had not been for the Federal Reserve System.

In the first place, through a provident provision in the act, the Federal reserve banks could be used as the fiscal agents of the Government. There already existed, therefore, a ready-made Liberty-loan flotation organization consisting of the 12 Federal reserve banks and their branches. This organization avoided the necessity of delay and vexatious effort which would necessarily attend the creation of an organization to do the work. It was through the Federal reserve banks and their branches therefore that the entire work was done. In passing, due credit should be given the various banking institutions and individuals and organizations for their cooperation in this work.

Important as it is, however, the service of the Federal reserve banks as an organization for the flotation of bonds and certificates was only an incident compared to the far greater financial assistance rendered the Government through the system. Individual banks were called upon in every loan to make vast credit commitments in order that the people might take up these bonds and make the sales successful. These banks never could have so extended their credit, and it would have been entirely unsafe for them to attempt to do it if the Federal reserve banks had not stood behind ready at all times to give support. In fact, the Federal reserve banks were continuously giving support by taking over volumes of bonds and certificates and furnishing funds and credit to the various individual banks whereby they in turn could furnish funds and credit to their patrons. Some conception of the load which the Federal reserve banks were obliged to carry to sustain our Government in its war financing and in its after-the-war financing may be estimated from a glance at a few figures. On February 7, 1920, the combined statements of the Federal reserve banks showed that they had total earning assets of $3,279,232,000. This huge total practically represents the total sum of funds and credits furnished directly or indirectly by the Federal reserve banks to the Government and to individuals, partnerships, and corporations for their financing. On May 16, 1919, the Federal reserve banks in the aggregate had discounted bills secured by war obligations of the Government to the amount of $1,863,476,000. These amounts just mentioned show the cash and credit afforded through the Federal Reserve System to the Government and to the people of the country, but this is only a small part of what the Federal Reserve System did for the Government and for private enterprise. The funds and credit it furnished the member banks gave these banks loaning power far beyond the figures presented here, and, moreover, the individual banks could extend their own credit with safety far beyond what would have been possible if we had had no Federal Reserve System to sustain our financial structure. The people of this country could not have purchased the output of Liberty bonds and Victory notes but for the loans given them by the National and State banks. The National and State banks could not have made the immense volume of loans necessary but for the extension of credit and support accorded them by the Federal reserve banks. The establishment and maintenance, therefore, of the Federal Reserve System was what made possible the remarkable success of the Liberty bond and Victory note flotation.

Perhaps no one feature of the Federal Reserve System can be pointed out as contributing more to uphold our financial stability than that which enabled the Federal reserve banks to accumulate a vast hoard of gold and keep it as a reservoir. Our whole credit system, except for the relatively unimportant provision as to lawful money, is based upon gold. The less gold the Federal reserve banks have the less funds and credit can they supply. The more gold they have the greater their power to furnish cash and credit. Under the old national banking system the same principle prevailed, but then the individual banks had to have the gold. The Federal reserve act enabled the Federal reserve banks to accumulate a store of gold to a volume not remotely possible to the National and State banks under the old system. It was this reservoir of gold which was at the basis of the extensive loaning power of our banking system. It was this reservoir of gold which enabled us to meet the tremendous demands for financing the war and to the Federal reserve act can be attributed the means whereby this gold reservoir was built up.

Without the Federal reserve act no one can conjecture how the war could have been financed. It is definitely certain that the old national banking system would have completely broken down under the burden. If temporary measures had been taken to support the national banking system, they would at best have been makeshifts, and the country would have paid an enormous price for its lack of a sound and efficient banking organization. At all events, the Federal reserve act was the financial rock upon which we built, and the people of this day and of the future will ever be under an obligation of gratitude to the greatest and best financial institution that has ever been created for the service that institution rendered in the winning of the war.

A BRIEF RÉSUMÉ OF THE SERVICE RENDERED BY THE ACT.

In my brief review I have made only a suggestion of the achievements of the Federal Reserve System. It has rendered extraordinary service before the war, during the war, and after the war.

1. It took the ultimate control of our banking and currency organization, of our loan and credit system, out of the hands of private bankers and placed such control in the hands of the United States Government.

2. It broke up the centralization of the banking power and substituted therefor decentralization without any diminution of strength.

3. Before the war its tendency was to stabilize and lower interest rates. In normal times it will continue to have this tendency.

4. It was the first banking and currency bill ever passed by the Congress of the United States which made special provision to meet the peculiar needs of the farmer.

5. It entirely eliminated seasonal scarcity and tightness of money and attendant high rates, afflictions from which the country had suffered annually at crop-moving time.

6. It gave assurance for the first time to the banker that financial crises could be averted and financial panics avoided.

7. For the first time since the Civil War it guaranteed to the business man at all times ample funds and credit for the maintenance of legitimate business.

8. It insured the wage earner against lack of employment, due to unnecessary financial disturbance and panic.

9. It made certain at all times an ample supply of currency, or what is commonly called money.

10. For the first time in American history it made provision for the establishment of American banks in foreign countries and furnished adequate banking means to finance and develop our foreign trade.

11. For the first time in financial legislation it made commercial paper rather than stock-exchange collateral the basis of our credit system.

12. It unified our entire banking system and transformed a system wherein thousands of individual banks were forced at times to pull apart into a system where all these banks would pull together for their common strength.

13. It concentrated our reserves and gave our whole financial system the benefit of the strength which such concentration created.

14. Subject to certain modifications, such as the power to loan on Government obligations, it inaugurated the new but sound principle that our reserves could be used as a basis for credit only by those who should use such credit for the purposes of production or distribution.

15. It gave the country what had been lacking since the Civil War, an essentially sound financial organization not alone of great strength and power, but also of proper elasticity and flexibility.

16. It enabled the Government and the people of the Nation to finance the war, and it contributed more than any other one governmental agency in the winning of the war.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT UNIVERSALLY COMMENDED.

In view of its great, almost miraculous, achievement and capacity for service, it is natural that the Federal reserve act should have received the unstinted commendation which has been bestowed upon it. It has received boundless praise from all sections of the country, from all political parties, and from all classes of our citizens. Those who doubted its merit, those who criticized it, yes, those who fought it unrelentingly, have turned right about face and have joined in the enthusiastic approval of this legislative triumph. All over the world it is looked to as a model of banking and currency legislation, and the Federal Reserve System is unhesitatingly accorded first place among the banking institutions of the world.

In two sessions of this Congress the Republican Party, although clothed with the power to do so, has not made a change or alteration in a single principle contained in the Federal reserve act. The Republican Party itself has been compelled to accept this great Democratic act as the embodiment of the highest and best principles of banking and currency which have yet found expression in legislative enactment. Indeed the banking and currency acts which have passed this Republican Congress have had for their purpose the development of provisions already present in the Federal reserve act. Not a single new idea has been presented. Every act of this Congress relates to an idea or principle to be found in the Federal reserve act. The attitude of this Republican Congress is a flattering compliment to Democratic achievement in the enactment of the Federal reserve act.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT AND REPUBLICAN FAILURE.

What a misfortune not alone to the Republican Party but also to the Nation that in their term of power they have accomplished nothing remotely comparable to this act. Who, for instance, would dream of making favorable comparison between the railroad act or the merchant-marine act, passed in this Republican Congress, and the Federal reserve act, the accomplishment of a Democratic Congress. The Democratic Party was afforded an opportunity and used it to enact one of the greatest constructive acts of our legislative history. The Republican Party was afforded an opportunity in the critical days of readjustment, but was unequal to the task of utilizing that opportunity.

Which party, on its record of accomplishment, has proved itself capable of constructive legislation? Not one great constructive work stands to the credit of this Republican Congress. The Democratic Congresses of recent years have reason to be proud of the many great works which they have accomplished, but the Federal reserve act alone fully demonstrates the capacity of the Democratic Party for constructive achievement.

WHO SHALL CONTROL THE NEXT CONGRESS?

Constructive legislation is essential for the Nation's progress in these days of reconstruction and reestablishment. To whom shall the great work be entrusted? The Republican Party, in view of its unfortunate failure to demonstrate constructive capacity, can not lay any valid claim to a continuance in power.

Is it not necessary for the performance of the arduous and perplexing work ahead of us to have in control men who can construct acts like the Federal reserve act? Would it not have been of the greatest value to the country to have had such men construct a railroad bill or a merchant-marine bill? Will it not be of vital consequence to the Nation to have such men in the next Congress to frame and enact the various measures required to promote the Nation's welfare?

The men who gave the country the Federal reserve act were Democrats. What they did do they can do. To these men, to Democrats alone, can the control of the next Congress be given if the next Congress is to measure up to the demands of the times.

The Democratic Party should be, and I am confident will be, returned to congressional power in the next election. They will not pass another Federal reserve act, for that is unnecessary, but they will come armed with the same powers and virtues which enabled them to create that masterpiece and come prepared to apply those powers and virtues to whatever legislative work is required to meet the needs of the Nation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

In his annual report (pp. 126–129) Secretary Glass called attention to the evils incident to revolving funds and reimbursement of appropriations. The present Congress, while it has laid claim to a record of economy based upon cutting down some of the estimates submitted by the executive departments and has passed a budget bill, so far as putting an end to the evils to which Secretary Glass called attention it has added to them. In the transportation act of 1920 it required the Government to pay its indebtedness to the railroads and deferred for a period of years indebtedness of the railroads to the Government without regard to the necessities of individual roads. In this manner it avoided making large appropriations, but at a tremendous cost to the Government, for some of the roads would have been able to pay their indebtedness immediately or at an early date. If it had not been for the desire of Congress to avoid the appearance of an appropriation, it seems reasonable to suppose that a smaller sum of money would have met the urgent necessities of the situation. The amount of the indebtedness of the railroads to the Government thus deferred for a period of years is in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000.

The shipping bill is in Congress, and it is impossible to say just what its provisions will prove to be. Judging, however, from a report of the conferees, the legislation will take the form of subsidizing the private shipping business (1) by building ships out of the proceeds of the operation and sale of Government-owned ships and selling the ships so built to private interests at less than cost; (2) by granting important exemptions from income and profits taxes; (3) by loans to shipbuilders at less than the market rate. All of these methods are open to the grave objection to which Secretary Glass called attention. If it is necessary and desirable as a matter of policy to subsidize a privately owned American merchant marine, the subsidy should be provided for directly by appropriation instead of by the highly objectionable methods which apparently are to be adopted.

No budget law can be of service and there can be no hope for economy in public expenditure so long as the use of public funds for private purposes is surreptitiously authorized by Congress without an appropriation.

The practice is not only vicious in principle but is a gross evasion, if not a direct violation, of the express prohibition of section 9, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

On December 2, 1919, the President recommended the simplification of the revenue act of 1918. The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report submitted to the Congress at the opening session in December, 1919, urgently invited attention to the necessity of revising the revenue act on lines which would produce the necessary revenue with the minimum of inconvenience and injustice. Again, on March 17, 1920, the Secretary of the Treasury recommended in a letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee certain amendments to the revenue act designed to simplify the measure and to make certain that the stock-dividend decision of the United States Supreme Court would not exempt from all income and profits taxes a group of approximately 2,500 personal service corporations and their stockholders.

The House of Representatives incorporated all the recommendations made by the Secretary of the Treasury on March 17, 1920 (except the ones suggesting a tax on the undistributed profits of corporations in lieu of the present excess-profits and war-profits taxes and another relative to the reduction of surtaxes on incomes saved and reinvested) into two bills, H. R. 14197 and H. R. 14198. These two bills passed the House but were not acted upon by the Senate. The fact is, that although both the President and the Secretaries of the Treasury recommended remedial revenue legislation at this session for the purpose of relieving the people of the country from injustices and inequities inherent in the present tax law, no legislation was enacted by the Congress. It is particularly important to note that the Congress has not eliminated or reduced the excess-profits tax, as urgently recommended by the administration.

In June, 1919, the Treasury called to the attention of Congress the necessity for certain additional legislation to amend the war-risk insurance act in the interest of the soldiers and sailors who participated in the war. The so-called Sweet bill, putting these recommendations into effect, passed the House on September 13 and was received by the Senate September 16, 1919. No action was taken by the Senate until toward the end of December, when the bill was passed; it was approved December 24. At the time the Sweet bill was passed by the House it was recognized that certain additions and amendments should be made to the measure, and it was expected that these amendments and additions would be included in the Senate. An attempt was made to do this, but at the last moment it was the decision of both the Senate and the House that such further amendments and additions as might be necessary should be included in the then pending Wason bill, which had been introduced in the House on November 5, 1919. The Wason bill was passed by the House early in May, 1920, and on May 21 it was referred to the Senate Committee on Finance. There are certain very important items in the bill which are essential in the administration of the war-risk insurance act and certain other provisions which are essential to the best interests of ex-service men and women as well as of those who by reason of their service have been disabled either by injury or disease.

The Treasury has repeatedly asked for an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the construction of vaults in the Treasury building, a matter of vital importance to the Government. It has also asked for an appropriation of $175,000 for a strong room for securities of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, $131,000 for fire protection of appraiser's stores at New York, and $1,986,000 for an archive building in Washington in which to preserve the valuable records of the Government, including the vast store of important records accumulated during the war. None of these important items has been granted.

For the special study of the cause, methods of transmission, and prevention of influenza, pneumonia, and allied diseases a request was made for $200,000, and nothing was allowed, in spite of the fact that influenza caused a mortality of 500,000 lives in four months in 1918.

For rural sanitation $500,000 was asked and $50,000 was granted, although not more than 3 per cent of the rural population of the United States has any health organization whatsoever, and there are some seven or eight million cases of malaria in the United States, causing an economic loss which has been conservatively placed in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000.

The Public Health Service recommended the appropriation of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year 1921 for the construction of hospitals for patients of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. This appropriation is now on the calendars of the Senate and the House, but with very little likelihood of passage at this session of Congress.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

This department urged the enactment of laws for the Americanization of all elements of our population; development of water power; leasing the oil, gas, coal, and other mineral resources of the United States; providing agricultural homes for soldiers of the World War; the allotment and opening of the Crow Indian Reservation; and the creation of the Roosevelt National Park, besides many other matters of a more or less routine, personal, or local character.

The departmental recommendations have been acted on as follows:

S. 3315. To promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes, passed the Senate on January 26, 1920, and is pending in the House.

H. R. 3184. To create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, and for other purposes, has passed both Houses and has been submitted to the President.

S. 2775. To promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain, passed both houses and was approved February 25, 1920.

S. 2890. To provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the disposition of tribal funds, and for other purposes, has passed both Houses and has been submitted to the President.

H. R. 5006 and S. 1391. To add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Calif., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt National Park, are pending in the House of Representatives and Senate, respectively.

Tax Legislation in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETTE B. HOWARD,
OF OKLAHOMA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress is to end its labors at 4 o'clock to-day. Congress has been in session almost continuously since May 19, 1919. When it adjourns this afternoon it will have been guilty of many acts of omission. None of these acts of omission, however, will bring greater inconvenience or suffering to the people of the United States than will the fact that the majority party in control of Congress during all this time has neglected to bring to the people relief in the matter of taxation. There has not been during the last two years any public question which has required and to which the people have been entitled to legislation above that of a just and equitable remedying of our tax laws. There is no one thing to-day that is more responsible for the high cost of living than our present inequitable war tax laws. So great has been the need for tax legislation in this Congress that the President of the United States, realizing that the business man, the farmer, the wage earner, and, in fact, the entire population was suffering by reason of the existing tax legislation, in his first message to the extra session of May 19 urged tax readjustment, and again in his message to the present session at its opening on December 2, 1919, he devoted about two pages of that message to an earnest plea to Congress for remedial tax legislation, saying relative to same among other things:

I trust that the Congress will give its immediate consideration to the problem of future taxation. Simplification of the income and profits taxes has become an immediate necessity. These taxes performed indispensable service during the war. They must, however, be simplified not only to save the taxpayer inconvenience and expense but in order that the liability may be made certain and definite. With reference to the details of the revenue law the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will lay before you for your consideration certain amendments necessary or desirable in connection with the administration of the law—recommendations which have my approval and support. It is of the utmost importance that in dealing with this matter the present law should not be disturbed so far as regards taxes for the calendar year 1920, payable in the calendar year 1921. The Congress might well consider whether the higher rates of income and profits taxes can in peace times be effectively productive of revenue, and whether they may not, on the contrary, be destructive of business activity and productive of waste and inefficiency. There is a point at which in peace times high rates of income and profits taxes discourage energy, remove the incentive to new enterprise, encourage extravagant expenditures, and produce industrial stagnation, with consequent unemployment and other attendant evils.

Supplementing the plea of the President for legislation on the question of taxation, the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report in December, 1919, made recommendations and urged Congress to enact remedial tax legislation. In the course of his remarks on this subject the Secretary of the Treasury said to Congress:

I believe it to be the duty of the Congress to give its closest attention to the study of the incidence of taxation with a view to the revision of the revenue act on lines which will produce the necessary revenue with the minimum of inconvenience and injustice.

As late as March 17, 1920, the Secretary of the Treasury addressed a strong letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, outlining a plan to simplify the income and profits taxes, specifying a number of other hard features of the present tax system and its administration, together with suggested remedies. The Secretary said on this occasion, in part:

Public opinion has not yet awakened to the gravity of the consequences which are likely to follow a failure to simplify the tax laws at this legislative session.

In this same letter, and going further in urging tax relief, the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury said:

I can not contemplate such delay without the gravest apprehension.

And concluded his very earnest recommendation to the Congress for relief in tax legislation as follows:

I shall be glad upon request to submit draft of amendments embodying the suggestions here presented, and to place at your disposal for the work of tax revision all of the personnel and facilities of the Treasury Department.

Not only this but during this entire Congress Democratic Members and Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee of this House have introduced many remedial tax measures, and have during the entire past 12 months constantly urged on the Republican majority of the Congress prompt and effective tax legislation. As late as May 25 of this year Hon. CORDELL HULL, Democratic Member of Congress from Tennessee, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and one of the best posted men of the Congress on taxation matters, urged upon the floor of this House remedial tax legislation and plead with the Republican leaders for immediate action without result. In that plea Mr. HULL, among other things, said:

We, nevertheless, hear many complaints against the existing war-tax system and a demand for a readjustment of the tax burdens. It is undoubtedly true, as was inevitable, that numerous hardships and injustices have resulted to certain taxpayers from a number of inequitable features in the present system in its application to existing postwar conditions. The taxpayer in his present situation, however, should realize two important facts: One is that much louder complaints against much more inequitable war-tax systems are being made by the taxpayers of the other nations participating in the war, and the other is that many, or most, of the injustices complained of could and should have been eliminated by Congress in extra session during the year 1919.

The trouble is not so much in high taxation as in its present equitable effects. Let me say, in the first place, that Congress exerted its fullest possible efforts to enact equitable war taxation. Senator PENROSE filed a report expressing the views of most of the minority on the revenue act of 1918, when it was reported to the Senate, and in that report he said:

"With respect to those provisions of the bill as amended by the committee, which it is estimated will produce $6,000,000 revenue for a full 12 months' period, we are generally in accord. These provisions are the result of months of painstaking deliberation and are based upon as accurate and reliable expert information as it was possible to obtain through every agency, official and otherwise. They reflect actual business, industrial, and economic conditions now believed to exist, taking into consideration the rapid transition during the year from the maximum war-needs production to the sudden cessation of hostilities and the arrest of war industry."

Both political parties in Congress were equally responsible for these war-tax statutes, because both shared alike in framing them; no substitute plans or methods were offered by the minority; both parties approved each measure as being the best that could be drafted amid war conditions; the House was equally divided politically; each bill was reported out of the House and Senate committees with practical unanimity, and the entire membership of each party, with scattering exceptions, voted for their final passage. Mr. Chairman, had the Democratic Party retained control of Congress it would have proceeded during the year 1919 to simplify and in many ways readjust the existing tax system; to substitute more equitable items for harsher ones repealed, so as to afford relief in many cases and classes of cases where serious discrimination or hardship existed; to raise some rates and lower others, and at the same time safeguarding the present volume of revenue. Other nations have already taken just such action. Any important war makes imperatively necessary three stages of revenue legislation: War taxes framed amidst abnormal conditions and calculated to raise the largest possible amount of revenue within the shortest possible time; a readjustment of the war taxes following the termination of the war, with a view to simplification and to removing inequities discovered and better to adjust the tax burdens in the light of reconstruction of postwar conditions; and, finally, the working out and perfecting of a permanent revenue system applicable to normal conditions. Our Republican friends in control of Congress have purposely denied the American taxpayers the much-needed relief which this second stage most strongly calls for, although the fullest cooperation has been constantly tendered by the President and the Democratic membership of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, there has never been a day since this Congress met that the Republican majority could not have, had they so desired, brought forth remedial tax legislation and extended to the people of this country this remedial legislation which is so much needed and under which all classes are bearing an unjust burden and great inconvenience.

During all this time the Republicans have had a majority of five on the Ways and Means Committee and a majority of about 40 on the floor of the House, and could have at any time brought out a measure from the Ways and Means Committee and passed it on the floor of this House had there not been a Democrat present at the meeting of the Ways and Means Committee or on the floor of the House when the matter was under consideration. Not only this, but during all this time all the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee and the Democratic Members of the House have been only too willing and anxious to cooperate in some kind of just and remedial tax legislation, but the Congress is to adjourn to-day without action of this kind, and for at least a year and a half the people of this country must suffer by reason of this negligence and the action of leaders in this Republican Congress in deliberately postponing this character of remedial tax legislation for one and a half years for purely political reasons, resulting, as it must, in untold injury to a vast number of taxpayers and to practically the entire population, is worse than criminal. When later the public, including the business man, the farmer, the wage earner, and all classes, realizes the injuries and wrong inflicted upon the country by this and similar omissions of this Republican Congress in its political policy to deny the suffering people this and other needed legislation, thereby encouraging and aggravating discontent in order to capitalize it at the November elections, they will realize that the great promises of the Republican leaders in 1918 to extend to the people beneficial reconstruction legislation have not been carried out, and they will also realize that any promises made to the people of remedial and reconstruction legislation by the Republican leaders in the coming campaign will be made only for campaign purposes, and suffering by means of the wrongs of omission and commission inflicted upon them by the present Republican majority in this Congress, they must realize that if they desire remedial tax legislation and reconstruction legislation such as is necessary, they must turn a deaf ear to the pleadings of the Republican leaders who have so neglected them during this session, and turn for relief to a Democratic Congress which will extend to the people of this country more of the kind of constructive legislation that was given to them during the time when the majority of Congress was Democratic, and during which time such constructive legislation as the Federal reserve act, the child-labor law, the Federal land-bank act, and many other pieces of real and constructive legislation were placed upon our statutes.

The Proposed Soldiers' Bonus Legislation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES V. McCLINTIC,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, April 29, 1920.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, the entire world is aware of the fact that the American soldiers struck the deciding blow in the World War with Germany. Everyone realizes that our soldiers were responsible for bringing the war to a close one year ahead of all predictions. Page 131 of the Government publication The War with Germany states for a period of 25 months—from April, 1917, through April, 1919—the war cost the United States considerably more than $1,000,000 an hour. If the war had continued for another year at this rate it would have cost the taxpayers of the country an additional $8,760,000,000. Approximately 300,000 of our brave soldiers were either killed or wounded. Another year of war would have increased the casualties to a much higher figure. When all of these facts are taken into consideration, no one can justly oppose legislation which will give to our heroes proper consideration by the Government.

The Democratic Members of Congress are in favor of rewarding our soldiers in the proper way. I am going to vote for the bonus bill. I know if the Democrats had charge of both branches of Congress that this legislation would have already been enacted into a law. The Democratic Party has already proven to be the constructive party of the Nation, and as proof of this fact I call attention to the following bills which were enacted into laws when the Democrats had charge of both branches of Congress:

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

(May 8, 1913, p. 1386, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

(Feb. 26, 1919, pp. 4343–4344, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Victory Liberty loan: Authorized issuance and sale of Victory bonds. Yeas, Democrats 170, Republicans 173; nays, Republicans 2, Socialist 1. Approved by the President March 3, 1919.

The good roads bill alone has made it possible to be expended in Oklahoma the sum of $12,676,000 for improving our highways. I voted for this bill. The rural credits act has proven a godsend to the farmers of the Nation. Prior to the passage of this law interest rates were high. Money is now being furnished by the Government land banks at a rate of 5½ per cent. Approximately $1,000,000 has been loaned to the farmers of the congressional district I have the honor to represent. I cast my vote for this law and have supported such other progressive measures as have been enacted into law during the time I have served in Congress.

The present Senate and the House of Representatives are under the control of the Republicans. Every committee chairman is a Republican. All legislation is under the control of the Republican steering committee, and no Democrat can get a bill considered without the permission of the Republicans. If the soldiers are not rewarded by this Congress, if the war profiteers who are responsible for the high cost of living are not properly dealt with, the people of the Nation will know who is responsible for this condition, and in my opinion will welcome the opportunity to support the Democratic Representatives who have worked and voted for legislation in the interest of the people.

The Achievement of the Republican Party.

OF

HON. AARON S. KREIDER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, about 13 months ago the Republican Party, in accordance with the will of the majority, took control of the legislative branches of the Government.

At the time we assumed control the ship of state was plowing through the rough waters of extravagance and mismanagement, and it is only through the most patient and painstaking effort that we are gradually guiding her back into the channel of safe and sane administration.

Our Democratic friends, however, chafing under their removal from control, charge us with failure to meet the problems of the day.

To this charge we reply that the problems confronting us are, indeed, complex, but we would remind them that they are largely the result of the flagrant failure of the Democratic Party during its majority.

The Great War just passed is still a vivid and living recollection. The valor of our soldiers and sailors, their splendid exhibition of courage, their renowned success—these still quicken our pulse in reminiscence and must always remain the proud heritage of our Republic.

On the other side of the aisle, however, there seems to be a disposition to hail these achievements as triumphs of the party. They seem to forget that it was not a partisan war. No party ever received more earnest cooperation, no President ever received more genuine support, than that rendered by those of us on this side to the Democratic Party in the conduct of the war.

We willingly and gladly voted without dissent for appropriations carrying billions of dollars that not one line of our defense might break down for want of funds.

We supported legislation giving the President of these United States more power than was ever possessed by any monarch, no matter how autocratic, because it was said it would expedite the winning of the war; and now, when we raise our voices in protest at the abuse of this power, at the reckless expenditure of money, we are called partisan.

We admit that in the crisis of war there must necessarily be some waste of expenditure, but in the main we contend that the Democratic Party failed in accomplishment; they made wanton and wasteful use of the people's money—money that came from a loyal, patriotic people rallying to the defense of their beloved country, and, regardless of sacrifice, poured forth their all in a golden stream.

The war, thank God, is past, but it has left behind a trail of broken lives, of mutilated bodies, of saddened hearts, and in addition the country is saddled with debt, much of which could have been avoided had the Democratic Party been a little more judicious in its financing of the war.

When we consider that we expended $1,051,511,988 for aviation and airplanes, and up to the time of signing of the armistice not a single fighting plane was at the American front.

As a result of our entire aviation program we obtained 213 De Haviland 4 observation planes, all of which were illy designed and constructed and extremely dangerous, and 527 second-hand foreign planes, which we either bought or borrowed from our associates in the war.

We expended $50,000,000 on a spruce-production program, building elaborate railroads, camps, and facilities, and then were forced to buy 92.6 per cent of our spruce lumber from private independent spruce lumbermen.

We spent approximately $10,000,000 on spruce railroads that never hauled a log of lumber.

We spent $20,000,000 for 4,608 Curtiss motors, 1,616 Curtiss-type aeroplanes, and 1,100 Standard JN–1 aeroplanes, which we purchased from the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, and then sold them back to this company for $2,720,000. The War Department refused to sell these machines to aviators for less than $3,500 each, and provided in the contract by which they were sold to the Curtiss Co. that the Curtiss Co. should have the first opportunity to buy any other aeroplanes which the War Department might thereafter declare surplus.

We spent $6,000,000 on Bristol planes and $17,500,000 on Standard-J planes, and got not a single machine that could be used for any purpose.

We spent $206,632,920 for 16 National Army cantonments, built by the cost-plus system. These could have been built for $128,101,399, or $78,531,521 less.

We expended $1,200,000,000 for the construction of camps and cantonments, largely by the cost-plus system, a system adopted by the War Department. By this system costs were increased, labor demoralized, the completion of the camps was delayed, soldiers called to the colors were subjected to conditions that induced disease and death, and from 40 to 60 per cent of the money was wasted.

Twenty-two million dollars was spent for fees to favored contractors on camps and cantonments, most of which would have been saved had this work been let by bids.

We spent $60,100,000 to build a powder plant at Nitro, W. Va. It never produced a pound of powder for the war. After the armistice there was stored at Nitro personal property worth at a fair cash value $10,000,000. Both plant and property were sold after the armistice for $8,551,000, most of which is in deferred payments.

We paid the Hercules Powder Co. for operating the Nitro plant $11,293,737.11. They produced no powder that we could use in the war.

We spent $116,194,974.37 on nitrate plants at Sheffield, Ala.; Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Toledo, Ohio; and Cincinnati, Ohio. These plants did not produce a pound of nitrates that could be used in the war.

We spent for poison gas $116,000,000. Not a pound of American gas was ever fired in an American shell, and only about 100 tons of American gas loaded in shells ever reached the field dumps.

The Government built three picric-acid plants and seven plants to make phenol and acid required by them. This was to furnish picric acid for the French, who desired it for explosives. None of these plants produced a pound of anything that was used in the war. The plants cost us $35,000,000. The French were to pay the whole bill, but the War Department settled with France for $14,000,000.

We spent $17,116,000 in constructing a port terminal at Charleston, S. C. It was built in an isolated swamp 10 miles up the Cooper River, where it was necessary to dredge to reach it. There never was a pound of produce, a man, or an animal shipped either out of or into this terminal during the war.

We spent $127,661,000 for port terminals at Boston, Brooklyn, Newark, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Charleston, and New Orleans. Some of them were not finished, and none of them were used for anything except storage during the war.

The Ordnance Department spent $3,991,489,570.48 from the beginning of the war until June 1, 1919, as much as it cost to finance the Civil War. A large part of it was spent in a program of manufacturing artillery and ammunition. This is what we got for it:

a. We had 53 contracts for 37-millimeter shells, on which we expended $9,134,582. Not one of these shells ever reached our firing line.

b. We had 689 contracts for 75-millimeter shells, on which we expended $301,941,459. Of these shells we fired 6,000.

c. We had 142 contracts for 3-inch shells, on which we expended $44,841,844. None of these shells reached the firing line.

d. We had 439 contracts for 4.7 shells, on which we expended $41,716,051. Of these shells 14,000 were fired by our forces.

e. We had 305 contracts for 6-inch shells, on which we expended $24,189,075. None of these ever reached the firing line.

f. We had 617 contracts for 155-millimeter shells, on which we expended $264,955,387. None of these ever reached the firing line.

g. We had 301 contracts for 8-inch shells, on which we expended $51,371,207. None of these ever reached the firing line.

h. We had 152 contracts for 240-millimeter shells, on which we expended $24,136,867. None of these ever reached the firing line.

i. We had 239 contracts for 9.2 shells, on which we expended $54,389,377. None of these ever reached the firing line.

j. We had 71 contracts for 12-inch shells, on which we expended $9,507,878. None of these ever reached the firing line.

k. We had six contracts for 14-inch shells, on which we spent $1,266,477. None of these reached the firing line.

l. We let 111 contracts, to the amount of $478,828,345, for the construction of artillery of all calibers, guns, howitzers, gun carriages, limbers, and recuperators. Of this immense program of expenditures there reached our troops and were actually used in combat thirty-nine 75 millimeter antiaircraft mount trucks, forty-eight 4.7-inch guns of the 1906 model, forty-eight 4.7-inch gun carriages of the same model, twenty-four 8-inch howitzers, and twenty-four 8-inch gun carriages.

To sum up, we furnished our troops for use six thousand 75-millimeter shells, fourteen thousand 4.7 shells, forty-eight 4.7-inch guns, and twenty-four 8-inch howitzers.

These are the principal things soldiers need to fight with—guns and shells, gas, aeroplanes, and tanks. And while there was such a failure to produce these essential things, it is amazing to know what excessive orders and expenditures there were on other less essential things. A few instances will indicate this:

We ordered 41,100,152 pairs of shoes and received deliveries of 32,227,450 pairs, for 3,513,837 men.

We bought and received 500,326 double sets of harness and 110,828 single sets. We had, in all, during the period of the war 580,182 horses, of which only 67,948 were shipped overseas and 96,000 died.

We bought 945,000 saddles and had, in all, 86,418 Cavalry horses.

We bought 2,850,853 halters.

We bought 585,615 saddlebags.

We bought 1,637,199 horse brushes.

We bought 2,033,204 nose bags.

We bought 1,148,364 horse covers.

We bought for our Ordnance officers 712,510 complete sets of spur straps, about 36 sets for each officer. We proposed to have our Ordnance officers properly spurred.

We bought 8,781,516 horseshoes.

We bought 195,000 branding irons.

We ordered 149,456,611 hard bread cans and used 31,500,000 during the war.

And these are facts that were brought out in the hearings held by the select committee appointed to investigate war expenditures. So we feel that we are amply justified in our contention that the Democratic Party failed in their obligations to the people of this country in the most critical moments in the history of the Republic.

So much for war expenditures. We might, perhaps, in the glory of victory have overlooked these extravagances had it not been for the fact that even after the signing of the armistice the administration has continued in this extravagance, and only by persistent effort on this side have we succeeded in reducing the expenditures that would have been involved had we accepted the estimates of the various departmental heads.

It has repeatedly been asserted on that side of the House that we have done nothing, absolutely nothing, in the year that we have been in power. When it is considered that we have at all times been confronted with the opposition of the Executive, that we have been in the midst of confused, distorted industrial and economic conditions resulting from the war, we feel that our record is remarkable.

We have reduced the estimates of governmental expenses over a billion dollars. The oil-leasing and water-power bills, two measures of large effect and high importance, which for many years have been halting and stumbling in the hands of our Democratic friends, have become laws.

We have passed the vocational rehabilitation act for the benefit of our wounded soldiers and have largely increased the provisions heretofore made for them by the Democratic majority.

We have also passed several acts for the disposition of war material, very necessary to our finances.

We have amended and improved the Federal reserve and the farmers' loan acts.

We have cared for the soldiers of the Civil War, straitened in their old age through the rise in prices, by an increase in their pensions. The civil-service retirement law, a long-deferred act of justice to faithful servants of the Government, will soon be in operation.

The Army and Navy pay bill and the Army reorganization bill, very essential in restoring the Army and Navy to a peace basis, have become laws.

An act for the upbuilding of the merchant marine and the settlement of the affairs of the Shipping Board, a very important measure, has also been passed by this Congress.

The budget bill, a measure of economy and sound financial administration, was also passed by this Congress, but the President, on the plea that it encroached on the power of the Executive, vetoed the same, and unhappily we were unable to secure the necessary two-thirds vote to pass it over his veto.

The law restoring the railroads to private ownership was one of the many problems that confronted us.

All of these achievements stand out conspicuously in our record of accomplishment, and in themselves deny that we have failed to accomplish anything during our first year of control.

The determination of the President to have the Versailles treaty with the League of Nations ratified by the Senate, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," has resulted in the country still being involved in a state of war. Much of this session has been occupied by another unsuccessful effort to agree on a peace settlement; following this we endeavored to pass a joint resolution formally declaring a state of peace, but we were again opposed by the Executive, who vetoed the same.

As a Member on this side of the House, I feel that we have rendered to those who placed us in power a good account of our stewardship.

However, there is still much to be done, and I believe that the next Congress should further reduce the Government appropriations at least $2,000,000,000, and thereby bring our expenses below our governmental income.

We should drop from the governmental pay rolls thousands upon thousands of useless but expensive clerks.

We should eliminate the tremenduous waste and useless expenditures at the various cantonments, Army posts, and so forth.

We should, as nearly as possible, reduce all expenditures to a prewar basis.

We should get out of Europe bag and baggage and stop the tremendous outlay in that quarter.

We should work for a business and economical administration, with a view to a reduction of taxes at the earliest possible moment.

I believe in a tax on luxuries but not on the necessities of life, a tax on stocks and bonds rather than on food and clothing.

We must reduce the cost of living by increased production, and we must recognize agriculture, that it is and must always remain one of the most important factors in national life.

Labor must have a square deal; steady employment at good wages. This is extremely important if the country and the people are to remain prosperous.

We must ratify the treaty of peace between America and Germany as well as Austria-Hungary.

I believe in international friendship, but not in entangling alliances with foreign nations, and should we join the League of Nations we should by careful reservation guarantee to America all the rights and privileges, both domestic and foreign, which she now enjoys.

Let us build a merchant marine which will carry products "made in America" to all parts of the world in our own bottoms.

We should deport from our shores all aliens who place the red or any other flag above that of our own.

We must stand for a stalwart, uncompromising Americanism, which supports the Constitution of the United States and places this country's interests first.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, permit me to say to my Democratic friends that for all they have done well we give them unstinted praise, and in commenting on that in which they have failed it is not our purpose to criticize but rather to let the light shine on their error that they may not fail again.

This is but our duty to the people of this Nation, who in a large measure have placed the responsibility of this Government in our hands, and we are confident they will this fall indorse our course and, in addition to the legislative branches, place in our keeping the executive control—

Ours be the pledge of loyalty and faith
To guard in safety o'er Time's unknown sea,
Thou noble ship of state, stanch, tried, and true;
Our hopes, our prayers, our lives are all for thee.

SPEECH

OF

HON. HENRY D. FLOOD,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 21, 1920.

The House had under consideration H. J. Res. 327, terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, as amended in the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution differs very materially from the resolution that passed the House some weeks ago. This resolution omits the preamble which the House resolution carried. The Republicans of the Senate had too much respect for their intellectual integrity to keep in the resolution the preamble as it passed the House, and so it was omitted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There were other suggestions made by the Democratic side which were not heeded by the Republicans but which the Republicans of the Senate heeded when they passed this resolution. They omitted the provision in the resolution which under certain conditions, if Germany had not consented to the resolution, would have put an embargo on American produce going to Germany. I pointed out in the minority report, and called attention to the fact, that the resolution would put us at a great disadvantage, especially the producers who find Germany the only great market for low-grade cotton, which under the provisions of the resolution must have been sold to England at sacrifice prices and let her sell to Germany at a profit.

And there would have been no opportunity for American manufactured products to find a market in Germany if that resolution had become a law. The tobacco growers and other producers would have suffered as badly. The Republicans of the Senate made changes in this respect that improved the resolution.

We pointed out that the House resolution in declaring a state of peace in Germany omitted Austria. The Republicans in the Senate took the suggestion and embraced Austria in the resolution.

There are but three propositions in the Senate resolution. One is that Congress has the right to declare peace. We take issue on that as a fundamental constitutional proposition. There is not a lawyer on the Republican side of this House who will seriously contend that Congress has a right to declare a state of peace.

Another proposition is that Congress under this resolution undertakes to enter upon diplomatic negotiations with Germany. Every intelligent man, whether he be a lawyer or not, knows that Congress has not that power.

The other proposition is to repeal the legislation enacted during the war. There is nothing that illustrates the hypocrisy of the Republican Party in Congress so much as the contention that they want to repeal war-time legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When this measure was pending before Congress in the shape of the Porter resolution six weeks ago I offered a motion to recommit, carrying an amendment that would have met the approval of the Senate and the executive department of the Government, and would have wiped off the statute books every piece of war-time legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Congress has been in session one year and one day, and there has not been a single hour when there could not have been brought in bills repealing the entire mass of war-time legislation or any one piece of that legislation.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Virginia has said, you have been in session one year day before yesterday and you have not repealed a single piece of this war legislation. It is idle for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to proclaim that they want war-time legislation repealed when he, as a leader of the Republican Party, nor any other member of that party, has undertaken to get an act passed repealing a single piece of that legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are willing to go before the American people upon that issue, and we will whip you so badly that you will hardly have a respectable minority. [Applause on the Democratic side and laughter on the Republican side.]

I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that there is patriotism enough on the Republican side to cheer the suggestion that the Republicans will not control this House next year. [Laughter on the Republican side and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] in reference to the President's position on the peace treaty is absolutely without foundation in fact. The President stands with the Democratic leadership of this Nation. The Democratic leadership of the Senate and the country has always stood upon solid ground on that question. It is for the treaty with such reservations as will preserve its essential integrity. It has opposed reservations that nullify the treaty and take the heart out of the League of Nations. When the President went abroad in December, 1918, every political party in this country had at one time or another indorsed a proposition similar to the League of Nations. He had a right to believe that the heart and mind of this Nation were with him, but unfortunately the Republicans carried the election in 1918. [Applause on the Republican side.] Yes; they carried it by corrupting the electorate in the State of Michigan in a way that no electorate in this country was ever corrupted before, and they hold the Senate now by the vote of that corruptly elected and convicted Senator. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republicans carried it, and the Republican Party threw to the winds the interests of the American people, the interests of humanity, and acted only for what they conceived to be the interest of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the President went to France he met at the peace table the most difficult problems that have ever confronted the statesmanship of any country. He met there the ablest and some of the most unscrupulous diplomats and statesmen of the Old World, but he triumphed over all of them and brought home a treaty signed by 32 of the civilized nations of the earth. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The war had imposed upon the statesmanship of the world a great duty. The heart of humanity demanded the negotiation of a treaty [laughter on the Republican side]—oh, that may not be very pleasing to you gentlemen, and I appreciate your applause, but I would rather that you would hear what I have to say, because you are ignorant enough on this subject to have it do you some good. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The world demanded the negotiation of a treaty that would prevent a recurrence of such wars as we had just had. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Every impulse of the heart was in accord with his purpose. In all the turbulent annals of humanity this project was for the first time feasible, but in this great hour Republican leadership absolutely failed, and Republicans saw fit to remember only that they were Republicans. The Democratic Party is satisfied with its position on the treaty and the reservations, and upon these issues we will meet the Republican hosts in November [applause], and we will meet Mr. HUDDLESTON, of Alabama, and we will give the combination a thrashing equal to that that the American doughboys gave to the Huns at Chateau-Thierry. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Upon these issues we are willing to go to the country. We have the moral and spiritual forces of the Nation behind us; we have the churches behind us, we will have business behind us, we will have the great agricultural interests behind us, we will have labor behind us, and we will have the women of the land behind us. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And we will elect a Democratic President, a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Public Should be Paid Something Sometime for the Water-Power Privilege, the Last Natural Resource it Holds in Fee.

OF

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 1, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides in subsection E that the licensee shall pay to the United States a reasonable annual charge to be fixed by the commission. This amendment intends to carry out that pledge. As the committee has reported it, the bill provides that when the licenses are issued, provided they are on a Government dam property, the commission shall have the right to revise and increase them every 10 years after the purchase. My amendment would reach the same result in regard to all licenses issued, whether they were Government or private propositions, and that would actually carry out the purported provisions of the bill. As it stands now, there would be no real pay for a license on Government property, except on licenses to use the Government projects for private business, for the reason that when you invite a man to build a dam and utilize the water rights, he has for several years to face adverse conditions, and it will be some time before he will make any money. It is agreed in order to encourage him the charge would have to be purely nominal and there would be no return for the license. It would be unjust to the man to say in the course of five years that he should pay any considerable amount. But after 10 years, when he is well under way, he will be able to pay something, and this commission should have the right to fix such charge from time to time as shall be necessary and reasonable. Unless that change is made he will pay the same sum the fiftieth year that he would pay the first year.

In other words, you are issuing licenses for 50 years on which the man would pay every year what he paid the first year. Now, if the business failed he would stop, and if the business succeeded, in 20 or 40 years he might be making enormous amounts of money. In 50 years there will be 10,000 of these licenses that should bring in hundreds of millions of dollars, and under this system you get nothing. Besides that there should be provisions protecting parks and special reservations, or authorizing the commission so to do. The commission will be composed of wise and prudent men. It will do nobody any injustice. It will not injure anybody. If my amendment is adopted after 10, 15, or 20 years they will call him up, look the proposition over, and if it appears that he is making money and can afford to pay for what he is getting from the public, they will assess him. They would be fair and just. There is nothing remarkable about this. It is peculiar and astonishing that it is not in here already. The result will be that if you do not put this in, the first thing you know you will have thousands upon thousands of people enjoying a government power and resource and making no return at all.

Out in my country long ago you gave the Government the land on which to build the Union Pacific. The Government could have built the railroad and sold those lands and paid for the railroads and made a lot of money for the Government and helped the settlers. As it was the promoters got the better of everybody that had anything to do with it and caused the biggest scandal the country ever had. The building of that railroad tainted the name of many Members of Congress. Congress should have made proper limitations and safeguards on railroad land grants. So we should say to these men, "You shall not have something for nothing." If they get a valuable thing, make them pay for it. If you tie the hands of the commission and say that the licensee shall pay no more in 30 years than in the beginning, you will never have anything paid, and there will be the greatest cry in 50 years about it that ever went up about any Congress. I am sure my colleagues have no plan to give away this public value intentionally. I know you do this from an oversight. But historians will not see it that way.

You are either doing something of importance or nothing at all. If nothing of importance, what is the difference? Why not protect the national forests and parks? Why not exact a revenue from these beneficiaries of the public? If this is an important matter history will judge you by how you decide as to what these people shall pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I suggest to the gentleman that the principal objection to this amendment is this: That for dams already built they know practically what they are and their possibilities, and as to those that are not yet built they issue bonds, usually running for 30 years. The water-power people represented to the committee that if they were compelled to have readjustment at periods of every 10 years or such a matter, they would have more difficulty in placing the bonds and in raising the money and determining upon large expenditures.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, yes. If there is no charge at all they could issue them and sell them more readily. We represent the public, not the speculators or investors. That is no reason why these people should not make a readjustment in a certain length of time. Twenty years is long enough for anyone to determine whether he has succeeded. A project that has not succeeded in 20 years will not succeed. There is nothing in that. Anybody who wants to sell bonds always wants to take the bridle off. When this bill was under consideration before, when it looked as though it might be ready to pass, I wrote to the President of the United States concerning the proposed legislation.

This proposed legislation is not only intrinsically important, but it is exceedingly important, because when you launch it it will be on the books for 50 years, in effect, since the licenses given under it will extend to that time, and you can not amend them in the future. As chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, my associates and I are preparing for your consideration a bill to establish a new Code of the Laws of the United States. I should hate to think that such a mistake as this is to be perpetuated for half a century in that great code if it is passed. The task of preparing the Code of the Laws of the United States is of a very exacting character and will require work every day till the 1st of next December, as this bill will be the largest ever introduced in any Congress or Parliament.

This summer, when the rest of you are at home campaigning, explaining to your constituents what you have done, what you have accomplished that entitles you to renomination and reelection, I shall be compelled to be here in Washington doing some plain, ordinary hard work with the law books, codifying and revising the laws, to complete the bill we are getting ready for the December session, which will assemble all the general and permanent laws in one great volume, the second time it has been accomplished in the history of the Republic, and that was 46 years ago. Probably I shall have no opportunity to campaign this summer and no chance to see my constituents or to render them an account of my stewardship. Even if a dozen opponents should arise to oppose me, I will be compelled to stick to my post in the committee room most of the time, till December in all probability, in order to get the new proposed code ready for passage, and I hope, gentlemen of the House, that such a mistake will not be recorded on its pages, if this bill should become a law, as fixing now a merely nominal charge to continue as such for 50 years, while the grantees of this great gift shall amass immense fortunes because they are given this property of the public. The public should be paid something sometime for the water-power privilege, the last natural resource it holds in fee.

Accordingly, I wrote the President when this bill was before the Sixty-fifth Congress. My objections to it were so pronounced and my views upon it so well settled, that I then wrote the President of the United States with a view to inducing him to veto the bill, which I had supposed would also pass the Senate but did not. That bill passed the House in the Sixty-fifth Congress but not the Senate, and no occasion arose during the Sixty-fifth Congress for a veto. I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and insert my letter and the President's reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman has both letters, I would be very glad if he would read them now.

Mr. HAMILTON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the President replied to his letter?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. My letter was as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 7, 1918.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President, White House.

SIR: The amendment of Mr. Ferris has called attention to the fatal defect of the water-power bill. There is another almost as serious. In order to encourage capital to invest in water-power development it will naturally happen that the charges for the licenses will be small, in order that the people putting in their money may be able to get their enterprises well under way. As the bill stands the practically nominal charge fixed in the beginning will continue for 50 years the fixed charge paid by these favored capitalists for the gift of the American waterways.

In a few years each industry will be successful, make great money, and could easily pay a reasonable return for the gift of the waterways, but for half a century no charge can be made and many of them will become immensely wealthy from this gift, and could well afford to pay, as they should, for what they get. An amendment should be made making it possible that the Government every 10 or 15 years readjust the charge for the use of the waterways according to the conditions. The people would then get something for what they are now to give away.

Years ago a dam was built across a navigable stream in my home district, and without making any payment for the privilege a sound business man there, and a very fine citizen, has legitimately accumulated a large fortune and is making a very large income. For this he is not at all to be criticized, but if our Government with its eyes open permits others to take charge of our waterways and accumulate fortunes without any return to the Government, it would simply be squandering the interests of the people in the waterways. Oliver Cromwell once said: "He that makes many poor to make a few rich suits not a commonwealth."

This bill provides that every 10 years there shall be a readjustment of the amount paid the Government where licenses are granted men to utilize the waterway projects of the Government as now established, and the same rule should apply to all licenses. The commission that issued them is well capable of properly readjusting the amount to be paid. Indeed, the right to readjust every 10 years would make the Nation entirely safe at the end of 50 years, if there were no other suggestion, and the Ferris amendment makes the Nation absolutely safe, if this amendment I mention is made.

Why should the Government practically make a gift of the last thing left to give away and then guarantee a return of every cent invested? There never was so objectionable a bit of legislation offered in the Congress of the United States in some respects. If the money were put anywhere else without any privilege whatever, the investment would be subject to wear and tear and time, and would have to pay interest upon the capital they borrowed, and they ought to pay the Nation interest upon the loan of this privilege according to its value. These people should pay for what they get as soon as they can, and the interests of the Government should be protected in that way.

With great respect, I have the honor to remain,
Very sincerely, yours,

E. C. LITTLE.

My idea was to present to His Excellency some of the objectionable features, as I was fearful they might escape his attention if a bill which had in it so much possibility of good were presented to him when he had not time to give it careful inspection. The President answered, and his reply is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 9, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD C. LITTLE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE: Thank you sincerely for your thoughtful letter of September 7 about the water-power bill. There is a great deal of force in what you urge, and the points you dwell upon have been giving me a great deal of grave concern. I thank you for assisting me to think out a very perplexing and serious matter.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

There was attention attracted to some of the evils in this bill as proposed in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and there has been some improvement in it, it is true. The method of terminating the contract in 50 years is not subject to as much criticism as it was before, but the objection to which I have animadverted to-day still exists. Of course, in order to encourage the investment of capital in the building of dams and factories along the navigable rivers licenses to build and establish must be at the beginning almost nominal, but in the course of a few years—10 years, perhaps—each adventure will be either a success or a failure. If a failure or a very mediocre success, the commission will not find any occasion to change the nominal rate, but if the capitalist succeeds and commands great trade and accumulates a great and growing fortune from the Government's gift to him of the right to dam the navigable rivers he could well afford to pay a reasonable rate for the continuance of that privilege.

As a matter of fact, the only reason this proposition is projected into Congress now is that wise and far-seeing men realize the possibility of great wealth if these licenses are granted. If there were not prudent men to look ahead, nobody would suggest such a law. I am not one of those who criticize such proposition or such men. As a matter of fact, they are the men that make the wheels go round in the world, the men who help lift up and carry forward the race, and it is entirely just that they should be suitably rewarded in a financial way for their services; but when a man has collected a reasonable competence there is no particular reason why he should advantage himself by the accidents of fortune, by the favor of the Republic, to pile Ossa on Pelion in the banks that business maintains and hand down his unearned increment to some descendant who had no part in creating his fortune.

Of course, the men who expect to do this are constantly insisting that they should be left free to run riot with the rivers of the Republic, and one can not blame them much for attempting to capitalize their intelligence to the last penny, but, gentlemen, if you allow them to take advantage of these grants to build up greater fortunes than they deserve, and to do this without any return to the Nation for what they receive, the future will blame you and condemn you in the harshest terms, and should do so. Rousseau said:

The greatest menace to a nation is the influence of private interest in public affairs.

The men who will receive these privileges, of course, are earnestly desirous that the law be enacted. The profits they will make if this law goes into effect are their "interests" in this "public affair" of placing this legislation on the law books of America. You can not afford to allow them to dominate the making of the rules under which they are to work if you are going to give them a monopoly of the rivers of the country; and do not flatter yourselves that this will not be a monopoly. Whenever a man dams a river he makes another dam near it impossible and is the owner of a monopoly of that water power which you are giving away for a song. You will establish thousands of monopolies in the corners of this country where men will amass fabulous fortunes by reason of the monopoly Congress gives them.

All I ask here, gentlemen, is that they be compelled to make a reasonable payment for the privilege. This is the last thing the American people have to give away. Let us be sure that it is free from the scandal of criticism that will spring up hereafter if men stand in amazement 40 years from now when some future Goulds and Vanderbilts and Astors hold in their hands the water power of America and all the vast interests that will be based upon it 50 years from now. These dams, scattered in every State, might irrigate 10,000 valleys some day and enrich 10,000 great communities. The privileges we are granting can not be estimated in present-day terms, for future years may develop other possibilities of which we do not yet dream. Who would have thought a few years ago that as we debate a dozen flying machines would be pounding in our ears in a fashion that right now is as ordinary as was the old cow 50 years ago? Who would have imagined at the close of the Spanish War that the automobile would be almost ready to supplant the railroad and the railroad track? We probably have no comprehension of what great wealth we are squandering now. If every 10 years or every 20 years the commission readjusts the charges to be paid the Government for maintaining these dams and controlling this water power, the Nation can receive a just and equitable return for the privilege. Shall we record ourselves in history as one "like the base Judean who threw away a pearl more precious than all his tribe"?

This money will be due the Government, and in 30 years might materially reduce the burden of taxation that will be falling upon our descendants. What right have we to squander the resources of the Republic? My amendment should pass and the commission should be empowered to adjust the amounts for the continuance of the licenses every 10 or 20 years. With these changes this bill could become a helpful law. The principle back of the amendment is sound. The return would be a just recompense, and the benefits that would accrue to the exchequer of the Republic might in 40 years mount to sums almost beyond the dreams of present avarice, sufficient to materially assist in maintaining the Nation and in enabling the citizens of the future to meet and terminate the immense indebtedness left to us and to them by the Sixty-fifth Congress and the great wars through which we have just passed. This bill should not become a law until the beneficent purposes for which it was conceived are based upon the broad foundation of a just reward for the privileges it would grant. With this very brief amendment and a provision for our forests the bill would commend itself to the present and the future as wise, useful, and well-guarded legislation, beneficial to the investors and procuring a just remuneration to the public, who have been forgotten so many times in great grants such as this. I earnestly hope that the House will recognize the necessity of this effort to protect the public rights in the public properties, so that there may be a thorough development of the water resources of navigable rivers without further delay. With such amendments the bill should become a law and they can very easily be made.

Army Reorganization.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JAMES A. REED,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, April 16 (legislative day of Thursday, April 15), 1920.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I now move to reconsider the vote just taken. On that motion I want to offer some observations.

Ordinarily I would not ask the time of the Senate to consider a motion of reconsideration where the vote was as decisive as it apparently was on the roll call just concluded; but I know from observation that the Senate has not considered the proposition on which it has just voted. I know that, because the Senate has been absent. Four or five Senators have been in the Chamber most of the time, sometimes as many as 8 or 10, and then, upon a roll call, the Members have come in and answered to their names and gone out. Nevertheless, the aggregate of all who came in and answered and then vacated has made a quorum; but it has been a quorum absent, not a quorum present.

The question we have just voted upon involved a gradual reduction of the Army, as fixed in the bill at practically 300,000, to a point at the end of five years of 210,000. I think I am correct in my figures. If I am incorrect, I hope the chairman of the committee will correct me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Army under this bill as it was drawn would start at 280,000 enlisted men and 18,000 officers.

It has now been amended so that there are 16,990 officers and 280,000 enlisted men. The officers were to be decreased 2 per cent a year and the enlisted men 5 per cent a year, so that at the end of seven years we would have had 16,200 officers and 210,000 enlisted men.

Mr. REED. Very well. The figures are a little worse than I thought they were—that is all. In other words, if the bill is allowed to remain as it is, with the proposition for a decrease in it, at the end of seven years we will still have 210,000 enlisted men and 16,000 officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The next Congress can reduce it if it wants to.

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly; that is true; and so I might say to the Senator's request for the adoption of this motion striking out, he might leave that to the next Congress. That argument cuts both ways and gets us nowhere.

Those who voted "yea" on the last roll call voted to keep the Army at the strength of approximately 300,000 men. Those who voted "nay" voted to reduce the Army to practically 222,000 officers and men. The full decrease would not become effective until the end of the period of seven years. In addition to that, there has been retained in the bill for some purpose—presumptively because it is supposed that it will produce some results—a general proposition of military training. If militarism is as popular as some gentlemen think it is in the United States, and as some of them would like to have it, there will be a very large number of men, indefinite as to amount, constantly under training, who are to be compensated, whose dependents are to be looked after, and so forth. In addition to that we have a National Guard, if it has not been entirely assassinated by this bill—and the claim, at least, is made that it has not been. If it has been, then this bill ought to be defeated in toto, for the National Guard is worth more than the Regular Army, five times over, if the National Guard is properly taken care of.

So that it is proposed now, in a time of profound peace, with Europe prostrate and exhausted, that we shall fasten upon this country an immense Military Establishment. I inquired for what purpose, and received no answer on Wednesday; but we had a partial answer to-day from a member of the Military Affairs Committee, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and, as nearly as he did answer, it amounted to this, that he believes there are going to be some internal troubles in this country, making it necessary to have a large Military Establishment.

Mr. President, I want to use as mild language as I can in discussing the proposition of internal trouble in the United States. Whenever the United States gets so that it requires an Army of three or four hundred thousand men to hold the people in check and subordination the country will have arrived at a very bad condition, indeed. There are some labor disturbances occasionally. Once in a while some men want better wages. Once in a while these men quit work.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator has proclaimed insistently against this country entering into a league of nations. Would he now take away from us the defense of an adequate standing Army?

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, that is a question entirely aside from the one I am discussing, but I shall come to it in a minute. Let me say in passing, we never yet have been blessed with a league of nations, and we never had a peace Army of above 80,000. Nevertheless we were not attacked. Besides, we now have 3,000,000 highly trained veterans who, properly armed, can defend America against any force that can be landed on our shores.

Let me stick to the theme I am talking about—internal disturbance. There never yet has been a strike in this country, save two or three, that was not handled by the National Guard of the respective States where the strikes took place. In the two or three other instances a very small contingent of Regulars reduced the territory to order, and did it within a few hours' time. All of this has been done substantially without bloodshed. The strikers, when they saw that the Government really meant business, have dissolved. Generally they have obeyed the civil processes of the courts.

I am not in favor of strikes; I never have been. I think them a very poor way to settle disputes. But as long as we have a free country we will either have the right of men to organize and strike or we must set up some tribunal to adjust differences between employer and employee. But I utterly repudiate the doctrine that men who strike for higher wages are such a menace and danger to this country that we are obliged to maintain an enormous standing army in order to put them down. There is nothing in the history of the past to justify such an opinion. There is not a doubt in my mind that while the ordinary union-labor man may strike to better his condition, he could no more be induced to enter into a revolt against the United States Government than the Members of the Senate. They are men who sometimes make mistakes, sometimes are misled, and sometimes their leaders are extremists and bad men. In a few instances that has been true. But the men have never had any idea of rebelling against the Government. They rebelled against what they thought were bad economic conditions. If what I say is not true, then this country is, indeed, in a very bad condition. If the union labor were composed of disloyal men, we would need an army of many times 300,000 men.

There is nothing more to be deplored than the constant attempt to convince the public that the country is honeycombed with disloyalty; that it is filled with men who seek to overthrow the Government. Sometimes this propaganda is put forward by cheap, sensational newspapers; sometimes by the cheap, sensational politician; sometimes by men who at heart desire a Government back of which stands the sinister figure of militarism. It is not true that the country is disloyal; there is not one man out of a thousand—I do not believe there is one out of ten thousand—who is not absolutely loyal.

Constantly we are witnessing this sickening and disgusting spectacle: Some one man, some agitator, some crank, maybe some anarchist, nearly always somebody from a foreign country, is arrested, and immediately scare headlines appear in every paper of the United States indicating that the country is infested with anarchy, with sedition, with lawlessness, that every community has within it a large and powerful body of men ready to rise and destroy the rest of the population, and yet one can live in the very community where these things are charged to be and be absolutely unconscious of their existence.

Some man goes out and organizes the tramps into a kind of an association. How many of them are there? You could get enough men in any one well-populated township in the United States to whip the whole bunch. Yet it is paraded before the whole country as some terrible danger.

There is everywhere in the world, in every country, in every age of the world there has been, and there is now, a class of men who are criminals or semicriminals. Some of them burglarize your house. Some of them hold you up on the highway. Some of them steal your property. But the world does not go into hysterics on that account. We trust to the sheriff of the county, the police force of the cities.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Is the Senator aware, from the report of what is known as the Lusk investigating committee of the Legislature of New York, a committee appointed by the New York Legislature to investigate treason and disloyalty in New York, that there are reputed to be many more than 100,000 persons in New York City who belong to societies organized for the overthrow of this Government and the substitution of a soviet, or some other kind of anarchistic government; that meetings are held every day of the week in New York City, openly and publicly, at which speakers advocate the overthrow of this Government; that the Senate passed a bill months ago to punish such things in proceedings at law and that the House has not enacted the bill into a law?

Mr. REED. I am aware, Mr. President, of these scarehead committees and of their performances. I do not take the slightest stock in any such extreme proposition. I have seen these legislative committees function. It sounds great when you talk about the "legislative committee of New York." I do not know the personnel of that committee, but I have seen other legislative committees. They are generally composed of men who seek notoriety more than they seek facts.

Mr. President, we have recently had a test of American loyalty. It occurred when we entered this war, and with the exception of a very small percentage of ignorant people, mostly foreign and mostly mentally deficient, the people rose as one man. I do not believe in the history of the entire world there has ever been presented by any nation, great or small, an example of more complete and unified patriotism.

In a time of excitement and hysteria men have been called disloyal for reasons that were ridiculous and absurd. I know an old farmer who was called disloyal because he wanted to keep his wheat and did not sell it at the time when a committee of patrioteers demanded that he should. Such examples as that are numerous. I know of a man who was pilloried down in Oklahoma because he would not buy $800 of Liberty bonds, that being the amount assigned to him by a self-constituted committee. The poor fellow did not have $800 worth of property in the world. Yet they were about to mob him. Things of that kind happen in time of war. We expect people to lose their judgment. The very existence of a sentiment, however, which went to such extremes only proves the intense loyalty of the people. The war is over, and we ought to get over it ourselves.

The papers are filled with stuff which, if read by the people of other lands, will convince them that America is a volcano of disloyalty and crime, ready at any moment to erupt. There is not a community in the United States which would not turn out and hang any scoundrel whom they had good reason to believe was disloyal to the flag.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], in asking me a question, spoke about some societies in New York the members of which openly advocated a soviet government. Let me say to the Senator from Montana that in a country where there is free speech a man has a right to advocate a soviet government, a bolshevist government, a kingly government, a democratic government, a socialist government, or even a republican government. As long as he does not propose to employ force, but only to appeal to the reason of the people, he has a right to advocate any kind of a change in the Government. That is free speech; and, if you deny that, you deny all free speech. It is not a question, when I advocate a form of government, whether you agree with me or not; or when you advocate a form of government, whether you agree with a majority or not. It is a question of whether the processes which you advocate are lawful processes, whether you are doing more than appeal to the reason and the opinion of the people. We might just as well get to understand that.

I remember in my early life when I thought the Republican Party was engaged in a servitude to capital which was inimical to, if not destructive of, the very liberties of the American people. The Republican Party was in the majority, and I enjoyed the blessed privilege of going out and saying what I thought about it. If I was wrong, I had a right to submit my opinion, and the people had a right to vote the other way. We might as well get to understand the doctrine of free speech, and if these societies are meeting, and if their advocacy is only an advocacy of a lawful change in the Government, in accordance with the Constitution and laws of this country, they have a right to exist. We can trust the common sense of the American people to repudiate any monstrous thing they may advocate.

A lot of people get out every two or three years and say the world is coming to an end. We do not suppress them. We let them say it is coming to an end. We trust to the common sense of the people to know that they are just a lot of lunatics; that is all.

A lot of people were in favor of woman suffrage and some of them honestly believed that if we did not have woman suffrage the whole world, or, at least, this country, would be ruined. Some of those suffragists went to the extent of violating the law in this city and defying the authorities. We did not go crazy about it; it seems to have been very persuasive to some of you. It never appealed to me; it was not a convincing argument to me.

Some Irish girls possibly have broken the law in trying to bring the cause of Ireland before the people, but we need not be alarmed.

The United States is here. There are some 110,000,000 loyal men and women in the country. They are still ready to fight for their homes and their country. Nearly all of them are sending their children to school; nearly all of them are pursuing the old means of thought and of development; nearly all of them are doing the best they can. The argument that we need a great standing Army to hold the people of the United States in subjection is absurd and monstrous. If you say we need an Army strong enough to properly police our possessions, if you say we need an Army here strong to meet some sudden emergency, that is a different argument. Upon that there can be no difference on principle between myself and the advocates of the bill. We may differ as to the number of men, but I am not and have not been addressing myself to that particular question. I shall do so in a few moments when I call attention to the enormous expense of this Army, but I want to reiterate now a few things that I said on Wednesday.

Do we need this great Army on account of world conditions? Is there any danger of the United States being invaded or her rights taken away from her? What nation menaces us? There are only five great powers in the world outside of Germany and Russia, to wit, France, England, Italy, Japan, and the United States.

Germany lies prostrate, practically disarmed, absolutely impotent and helpless so far as her ability to attack the United States is concerned. She has no war navy to cross the sea. She performed that delightful office which the Secretary of the Navy said would be the greatest thing witnessed since the crucifixion. She sunk her own vessels, and he had said they ought to be taken out in the ocean and sunk.

Of course, some other men might have thought it would have been a good idea to bring them over here and add them to our Navy instead of building new ships just like them. But Germany sunk many of her vessels and Great Britain took the rest, as Great Britain usually does take things.

We are in no danger from Russia. Russia is practically without a fleet. She is practically without a government. Neither Germany nor Russia can ever come to this country and do us any harm until the time has arrived when they shall have been completely rehabilitated, and that must lie a long distance in the future.

Are we in danger of attack from our allies in the late war? If so, then they would be guilty of perfidy unparalleled in the history of the world. If they would do that sort of thing, then all this talk about assembling them around a table and going into partnership with them for life is the most monstrous of mistakes.

I do not close my eyes to the fact, however, that one of them may disturb us to some extent. I do not believe the others will, but I believe that if any European power were to attack the United States to-morrow, that power would find herself attacked from the rear the next day. Suppose that Great Britain were to attack us, how long would it be after she came to a death grapple with the United States until Germany would rise to strike her from the rear?

Suppose France were to do so inconceivable a thing as to attack the United States; she would be even worse situated than Great Britain. Instantly her colonies would be in revolt and the German would prepare to take his revenge. The cry that the enemy is at our gates does not alarm me.

Mr. President, there are several elements of strength upon which a country must depend in the time of great stress and need. Chiefest among these is the loyalty of the people. As to that I have no question of doubt. Another is the economic strength of the country, and to that I think it is time the Senate should begin to give some careful consideration. If we spend all the money we can raise from year to year and do not reduce the public debt, we will be seriously handicapped in any great war.

We owe to-day twenty-five thousand millions of dollars, a sum that is inconceivable, that no human brain can compass. The annual interest charge constitutes a grievous burden. It is now proposed to increase that burden by the establishment of an immense standing army. We can not wipe out the debts and at the same time carry these enormous burdens.

In illustration of the increase of the military burden I call attention to the fact that in 1875 we appropriated for the Army only $27,788,500. In 1916 the appropriation had increased to $101,974,195.87. For 1918, which I think includes the year of the war, we appropriated $5,249,086,335.89. Of course that is abnormal. But now for the year 1921, at a time when we are in a state of peace, we propose to appropriate for the Army alone $609,806,217, and that does not cover the expenditures of anything but the Army proper. We must still deal with a Navy budget of astonishing magnitude.

Mr. President, while we are this year expending over $600,000,000 on the Army—indeed, I think the total will mount to $770,000,000—we expended in the year 1916 on agriculture only $22,971,782. We expended on rivers and harbors in the same year aproximately $33,982,000. We expend about thirty times as much upon the Army as we do upon agriculture.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the Senator from Missouri is aware of the fact that in the river and harbor bill as it passed the other House there is a lump-sum appropriation of only $12,000,000 to provide for river and harbor improvements, and in the bill as reported to the Senate that amount has only been increased to $20,000,000?

Mr. REED. Yes. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

We are to expend for the Army alone close to $8 per capita, counting every man, woman, child, and baby in the land. If a man has a family of five, he has to pay for the support of the Army alone approximately $40. The estimates for the Navy, as I remember, aggregate $917,000,000. So, all told, the head of a family of five will be taxed for the Army and the Navy alone, as I figure it roughly in my head, over $75. While we are expending these vast sums for an Army in times of profound peace and for a Navy when the millennium is just dawning, we are cheeseparing on the appropriations for rivers and harbors and are cutting down those appropriations. The sum of $12,000,000 is all that the House of Representatives allowed for the improvement of all the rivers and harbors of this country; and after a great battle we succeeded in raising the amount in the Senate Committee on Commerce to $20,000,000. Whether that will stay in the bill or not is dependent upon the temper of the House of Representatives.

Every dollar that is expended wisely for rivers and harbors is an investment; it is not a debt; it brings back a rich return. When you make rivers navigable or remove obstructions to commerce in our lakes and in our harbors, every man, woman, and child receives a benefit—indirectly, of course, but nevertheless a benefit of cheapened transportation. When you build a good road and make it easier to move goods from one part of the country to another, you decrease the labor necessary to the production and marketing of an article. When you have appropriated money in Congress to open the arid lands of the West and to turn the desert into fruitful farms, you have generally multiplied your investment by 8 or 10 to 1. The old story of making two blades of grass grow where but one grew before is illustrated every day in the application of the moneys of the Government to the furtherance of transportation and to the development of commerce and industry, but you can not get from the Congress of the United States any money for these beneficent purposes without haggling and fighting over it day in and day out.

One reason so large an Army is provided for in the bill is that there is a lobby here looking after the Army. They are roosting in the gallery now in noticeable numbers; but you do not find any committee of farmers there when the agricultural bill is up, and you do not find any committees to represent the arid West or the swamp lands of the South, or the great territories drained by the great inland rivers. Such committees have to pay their own expenses. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. But the Army is on the job all the time. The more you increase the Army the more you increase the lobby; they grow in direct proportion.

So far as I am concerned I do not want to say anything against the Army; it is a good Army, composed of good men; but they have been perniciously active during this entire session.

If we were to take the amount of money that we will pay out for a standing Army of 300,000, we could in a very short time reclaim enough land in the arid West and enough swamp land in the Middle and Southern States to feed 20,000,000 people.

An Army of 300,000 men is unnecessary. We are told that the National Guard is to be built up and strengthened. In that event the Regular Army can be greatly reduced.

A good National Guard and a small Regular Army are sufficient for all present demands and for all probable emergencies that may arise for many years to come; for with a National Guard, properly supported and encouraged, you have an Army there that will take care of this country in any emergency, if you have at the same time a standing Army of 200,000 men in this country.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say upon this subject.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D. SCHALL,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I favor the passage of laws that will give the farmer the best possible advantage and opportunity. You can not penalize agriculture without penalizing the best interests of the country. The war taught us that. Protection has been the underlying basis for our prosperity. Organization is the order of the day. No farmer can compete single handed with conditions as they exist. It is imperative that he follow the commercial current of the present and cooperate for buying and selling. Cooperation on the part of the farmer will not result in abuses when backed by honesty of purpose and unity of ideal.

Neither the cause nor the remedy for the high cost of living has been run to earth. What boots it to uncover graft in high places, indifference to duty, waste by great generals, speculation by profiteers, and the financing of this last by the very banks designed to hold the boat steady, when the political appointees of the party in power fail to act, refuse to do their manifest duty? Manipulating speculators aided by loaning have contrived to kill the law of supply and demand. By the timely loans and reloans of the friendly banks they are enabled to hoard vast quantities of condensed milk here and sugar there and wheat yonder and absolutely control the price level. The Koran had a law that whoever stored wheat over 60 days should be cast out from the number of the faithful. The canny bankers when they gather round their full and sumptuous banquet boards are busy making speeches, which next day are spread far and wide in the press, how the high cost of living is due to strikes or to wildcat speculation on the part of wage earners or to buying of luxuries by people who have not up to now been able to afford it or to too little production. Always something for which the workers are to blame. It reminds me of the pickpocket, Fagin, who ran along with the crowd crying, "Thief, thief," and all the time the stolen goods were in his pocket.

The farmer is no profiteer. How could he be? He has no more to say about the price of his product than the consumer who buys it. The farmer goes to labor. Labor is organized, and says, "I will work so long for so much." The farmer takes his eggs or his hogs or his wheat to town. He goes to the provision house. He says, "What's the price of eggs to-day?" They tell him. It is a low price, but rather than haul his eggs or his hogs or his wheat back, to wait for a better price, he sells. Then he wants to get a pair of shoes or a new tire for his Ford. They do not ask him what the price of their goods is. He goes to a tire shop and asks the price of tires. It is a stiff price. So he tries another shop. Same price. He goes all over town. Same price everywhere. There is no such thing any more as price competition; there is an organized agreement as to price everywhere. So the farmer gets it going and coming.

The middlemen fix the prices. Successful Farming says:

The price of grain is named by four great elevator men of the Chicago Board of Trade. The price of butter is fixed by the Elgin butter board. Live stock by the packers. Wool prices by the commission men. Cotton prices by the future quotations on the New Orleans and New York exchanges.

The farmer is not asking special privileges. He only asks a chance for an equal footing with capital and labor. There is no thought of dictation, of denying the privilege to any other farmer, or of forcing an unwilling cooperation on anyone. The farmer must protect himself and secure stable prices through cooperation. The single twig is weak, but the bundle of twigs hold together and can not so easily be broken.

The Sugar Situation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WHIT. P. MARTIN,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the price and supply of sugar has been so much cussed and discussed, both in and out of Congress, for the past six or eight months, that it may not be out of place to soberly and candidly discuss the situation for the purpose of determining "where we are at."

There is undoubtedly a world shortage of sugar, but not such a shortage as to cause a runaway market or to lead the people of this country to believe that a sugar famine is inevitable.

In 1916 the sugar production of the world amounted to 16,987,975 tons, and in 1919 it amounted to 15,217,170 tons.

This shows a decrease in production of approximately 9 per cent, which, though considerable, gives no cause for alarm in this country, especially in view of the fact that we are assured much more of our share of the world's production.

We produce in the United States and its insular possessions approximately one-half of the sugar we need, and our close proximity to and trade relations with Cuba make this country the logical and most attractive market for the Cuban output.

The estimated Cuban crop of the present year, owing to unfavorable weather and labor conditions, has fallen off considerably. On January 1 of the present year the Cuban crop was placed at 4,500,000 tons, but the latest news from that island places the crop at a little less than 4,000,000 tons.

But even this would in normal times not only supply our needs but would leave some 2,000,000 tons to be exported to other countries.

What, then, have been the causes which have led to both the high price and apparent scarcity of sugar?

The causes are many, but the outstanding cause which has created an unusual and unprecedented demand for sugar and the consequential high price has been the constant agitation and publicity given the abortive attempts to control the price and supply of sugar by means of investigations and legislation.

When, on December 16, 1919, the House had under consideration S. 3284, known as the McNary bill, which had for its purpose the continued control and distribution of sugar by the United States Sugar Equalization Board, I made this statement during the course of the debate:

This bill is not only unnecessary but its consideration and agitation before Congress for the past three months will be responsible for the high price of sugar next year.

The hearings on the McNary bill began before the Subcommittee on Agriculture of the Senate on October 3, 1919, and the bill finally passed both branches of Congress just before the Christmas holidays, and was signed by the President on December 31, 1919. It was then too late to even attempt to carry the provisions of the bill into effect, but the publicity given its consideration had a very far-reaching effect upon the sugar market.

Mr. Zabriskie and other experts who appeared before the Senate committee testified that there would be a shortage of sugar in 1920, and that they had for this reason brought to the attention of the President the advisability of purchasing the Cuban crop. The same authorities stated that they believed that at that time—October, 1919—the Cuban crop of raw sugar could be purchased at from 6½ to 7 cents per pound, and yet, when the McNary bill was signed by the President on December 31, 1919, Cuban raws had advanced to 11.75 per pound.

This tremendous jump in the price of sugar was but the natural and inevitable result of the prediction of the sugar experts that there would be a sugar famine in 1920. The press of this country and of Cuba carried in glaring headlines the announcement that sugar would be scarce and at a premium in 1920.

The manufacturers of sugar products, both essential and nonessential, immediately began to lay in a supply of sugar, to the end that their industries might not be affected by the predicted sugar shortage. Housewives who had previously purchased sugar from day to day as their needs demanded deemed it wise to prepare for an emergency and to store a few pounds of sugar in their pantries; and let it be remembered that there are 110,000,000 people in this country, and if every person should store but 10 pounds it would mean that 1,110,000,000 pounds of sugar would be withdrawn from consumption.

The unscrupulous speculator, who is always ready to take advantage of public suffering and want, immediately began to hoard sugar and manipulate the market.

In the meanwhile the Cuban producers had begun to sit up and take notice.

Mr. Hoover, in testifying before the Judiciary Committee of the House, stated that at the time the Cubans were willing to accept 6½ to 7 cents for their 1920 crop the Sugar Equalization Board had information two months in advance of the Cubans as to the prospective shortage. But when the Cubans saw the much-advertised prediction of a sugar shortage and when they witnessed the wild scramble for sugar, which very quickly absorbed the domestic supply, they were not slow to take advantage of the fact that this country was entirely at their mercy and to put up the price accordingly.

THE TINKHAM INVESTIGATION.

However, this crisis in the sugar situation was intensified and made much worse by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], who added fuel to the flames by introducing on December 18, 1919, a resolution in the House calling upon the Attorney General to report upon what authority of law he had fixed or agreed upon a price for which Louisiana sugars might be sold.

The answer returned by the Attorney General to this resolution was immediately followed by House resolution No. 469, directing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate and report upon the action of the Attorney General in concurring in a maximum price for Louisiana clarified and plantation refined sugars.

This resolution was passed in the House by a strict party vote, it being apparent that the purpose of the resolution was not to relieve the sugar situation, but that it was an attempt to discredit a public official who, by reason of his splendid record, was looked upon as a presidential possibility.

Accordingly, on April 6, 1920, the hearings began on this resolution before the Subcommittee on the Judiciary, with the Hon. JAMES W. HUSTED as chairman and with the Hon. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, the author of the resolution, as the first and star witness.

The hearings had not proceeded very far before the situation became somewhat mixed and it became a hard matter for the disinterested onlooker to determine whether the action of the Attorney General was being investigated or whether the action of the gentleman from Massachusetts in introducing such a nonsensical resolution was the subject of the investigation.

While the investigation was given rather a wide range, taking in the price of jam in Porto Rico, the price and cold storage of meat, and the pursuit and prosecution of a haberdasher for selling shirts and collars at unreasonable prices, yet the gentleman from Massachusetts did succeed in establishing one fact, which was forthwith heralded from the housetops—that the shortage of sugar would not be confined to 1920, but would last for two or three years longer.

In response to this announcement, so clearly and forcibly brought out in the examination of Mr. Hoover, the price of Cuban raw sugar has increased by leaps and bounds until, on the 23d day of May, it was quoted at 23.57 per pound.

In view of this fact, so well established by the highest authority in the land, it is not surprising that the minority members of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary should state in their report:

It is believed that the acts of Mr. TINKHAM and the publicity given the sugar situation by him had a great effect upon the desire of the consuming public to obtain an ample supply of sugar and to protect themselves against the shortage, and has been a potent factor in the rise of prices of sugar.

THE ACTION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

In his zeal to show that the Attorney General exceeded his authority or acted in violation of the law, the gentleman from Massachusetts undertook to tell the committee how he would have handled the Louisiana situation had he been in the place of the Attorney General. He suggested two or three different plans of action, and when one plan was shown to be impossible and impracticable he would suggest another, until he finally submitted a plan that was identical with that followed by the Attorney General.

The gentleman from Massachusetts sets forth his first suggested plan of action in the following language:

I think that the only authority that the Attorney General had under the law was to prosecute individual profiteering cases. Now, what result it might lead to makes no difference. He had to act within the authority given him by law. As I stated before, it would be a very difficult thing to indict and convict where there were so many varying conditions and varying factors which would enter into the problem of whether the profit or price was extortionate or not. I will admit that.

I rather think, however, that what practically would have worked out would have been this: That if the Attorney General had made an examination through his United States attorney and found out what seemed to be a fair price, and then had prosecuted and established as he had a full right to do under the law what the jury in that particular case thought was a fair price, the trade would have more or less settled to whatever figure that might be. Now, I could not say that would result from one case. In other words, he could take the same course that, as I understand it, was taken under the antitrust law—the Sherman law—where the rule of reason was established by several decisions. Men do not want to contest with the Government; men do not want to pay attorneys' fees unnecessarily, and if they can find out what they should do, the honest one and the fair one usually wants to pursue that course. I know that the average man is honest and fair and wants to keep out of court and out of trouble and avoid trouble and expense.

Now, that seems to me a fair statement of what my opinion is and what should have been done.

At this stage of the hearing the gentleman insisted that the only authority the Attorney General had under the law was to prosecute individual cases of profiteering, and by arresting one or more of the sugar producers of Louisiana let a jury determine what would be a fair price.

But when the gentleman's attention was directed to the fact that Louisiana only produced about 40 per cent of a crop, which was by no means uniform, some sections of the State only producing 10 per cent of a crop, while others produced as high as 60 per cent, so that one producer would make no profit if he sold his sugar at 50 cents per pound, while another would make considerable profit by selling at the same figure, he then began to qualify and modify his suggested method of procedure.

Realizing that a fair price would not be arrived at by the arrest and trial of one or two cases, and that his plan meant the arrest and trial of every producer in Louisiana, whether guilty or innocent, the gentleman thereupon abandoned the plan and suggested that the Louisiana situation might be handled by fixing a margin of profit.

In his cross-examination of Mr. Mooney, the United States district attorney from Louisiana, the gentleman asked this question:

Mr. TINKHAM. May I suggest this: Would it not have been better, as the Lever Act did not apply to agricultural products as such, for you not to have attempted to enforce the Lever Act, because it was unenforceable against the producers of agricultural products, and then have set a margin of profit for the manufacturer?

Before showing the utter impossibility of fixing the price of sugar in Louisiana by setting a margin of profit, it might be well to pause for a moment and show the inconsistencies of the first two plans proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts and which he would have followed had he been the Attorney General.

First, he tells us that the only authority that the Attorney General had under the law was to prosecute individuals for profiteering, and that he was without authority in law to fix or to concur in a maximum price; and then he suggests that a margin of profit should have been set for the manufacturer.

In one breath he denounces the Attorney General for failing to prosecute and in the next he suggests a plan by which no prosecutions would have been necessary.

He first severely criticizes the Attorney General for having fixed or concurred in a maximum price for Louisiana sugars and then finds fault because the Attorney General did not do this very thing. To fix a margin of profit means to determine the cost of production and then add thereto a fair margin of profit, and this would be nothing more nor less than fixing the price of sugar.

This is the very thing for which the Attorney General was denounced in unmeasured terms both on the floor of the House and before the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and yet the selfsame gentleman suggested that rather than to have attempted to enforce the provisions of the Lever Act against profiteering it would have been better to have fixed a price by determining what would be a fair margin of profit.

The margin-of-profit suggestion was impracticable and incapable of execution for two reasons.

First, because it would not have established a uniform price. The cost of production varied very materially in sections of Louisiana. In some sections sugar could be manufactured at a cost of 15 cents per pound, while in others, where the cane crop was almost a failure, it would cost from 30 cents a pound up, so that to establish a margin of profit would mean that sugar would have sold in Louisiana at from 15 to 30 cents a pound.

Second, because the manufacturers of sugar had much earlier in the season entered into written contracts with the cane growers, by which they bound and obligated themselves to pay the cane grower the sum of $1 per ton of 2,000 pounds of cane for each cent or fraction thereof that yellow clarified sugar sold for on the New Orleans sugar market, as shown by the weekly average to be established by the secretary of the New Orleans Sugar Exchange.

The certificate of the president and secretary of the New Orleans Sugar Exchange, found on page 199 of the hearings, shows that the only Louisiana yellow clarified sugars that sold on the New Orleans market from October 23, 1919, up to the time quotations were withdrawn because of the action of the Attorney General brought 20 and 20½ cents per pound. The cane growers, therefore, were entitled to receive from the manufacturers from $20 to $20.50 for every ton of cane delivered, and with a written contract were in a position to exact this amount from the manufacturer in a court of justice.

The manufacturers, therefore, would have been compelled to sell their sugars at a price exceeding 20 cents a pound; otherwise they would have gone bankrupt, as they could not afford to buy cane at $20 per ton and only receive for the product therefrom a price based on cane at $17 per ton.

The only possible way to meet this situation and reduce the price of sugar was by the action of the Attorney General in having the cane growers and manufacturers meet with his representative and agree to abrogate and set aside their written contract, which resulted in the cane grower accepting $17 for his cane and the manufacturer 17 cents for his sugar.

Had the Tinkham margin of profit suggestion been adopted, no yellow clarified sugar could or would have been sold on the New Orleans market for a price under 20 cents per pound.

Both the cane grower and manufacturer in Louisiana wanted an open market, and felt that the price of their agricultural product should, like others, be governed by the law of supply and demand; but certain it is that if the margin of profit idea had been adopted Louisiana sugars would have sold not under 20 cents and possibly as high as 30 cents per pound.

This brings us to the last suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts—as to how the Louisiana sugar situation should have been handled.

After stating that the Attorney General, in arriving at a decision as to what would be a fair price of Louisiana sugars, should have consulted the consumers, the reports of crop conditions made by the Department of Agriculture, and ascertain as far as possible the estimated cost in the production of sugar, the gentleman then states, in answer to a question propounded by Mr. WHALEY:

Mr. TINKHAM. There would have been no harm in the Attorney General saying that he thought a certain price was fair, but what I object to and where I say the illegal action was in this case was in making the agreement and in fixing the prima facie case.

I think that, if he had stated that he thought—just as he did in the coal case—that a certain addition to prices was sufficient and that he would take notice, or his office would take notice, of any other additions to prices, it would have been a perfectly correct policy to follow. It would have been unusual, but these are unsual times. But I think he would have been acting within his power and within his discretion if he wanted to do that. But when he makes a contract and sets up a prima facie case, as he did in this Louisiana sugar matter, then he is doing something which is illegal and something which as a matter of public policy is absolutely unsound, in my opinion.

The evidence of Mr. Mooney, the United States district attorney at New Orleans, who handled the matter for the Attorney General, shows that he consulted the largest consumers of sugar and consulted with everyone who could give him information; that he examined the crop reports and estimates from the Department of Agriculture; that he read the report of the Tariff Commission on the cost of sugar production; that he had prominent cane growers and sugar producers to appear before him and submit to him their cost sheets showing the estimated cost of production; and that at the suggestion of the Attorney General, he called in and consulted with ex-Senators Murphy J. Foster and Walter Guion, both of whom resided in the sugar district and neither of whom were interested in the production of sugar; and that having followed every suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he arrived at the conclusion that there could be no profiteering in sugar in Louisiana if clarifieds were sold at 17 cents and plantation refined at 18 cents.

All of this having been done, and the gentleman from Massachusetts having previously stated that there was no harm in the Attorney General saying that he thought a certain price was fair, and that it was a perfectly correct policy for him to state that he would take notice of any additions to price, it follows that to this extent the action of the Attorney General was entirely in accord and met with the hearty approval and indorsement of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

But the gentleman states that what he objected to was the action of the Attorney General in making an agreement or contract with the producers and in setting up a prima facie case.

True it is that in his telegram to the United States district attorney, in which he approved and concurred in the action taken by that official, the Attorney General did suggest that an agreement in writing be secured from the producers and refiners, to be used as prima facie evidence when prices were charged in excess of agreement.

But it developed in the hearings that this suggestion, and it was only a suggestion, made by the Attorney General, was never carried out. No written contract or agreement was ever entered into by the producers and refiners to be used as prima facie evidence, but the producers and refiners merely held a meeting at which they agreed that they would not sell their sugars at figures in excess of the fair price suggested by the Attorney General.

The Attorney General, therefore, having followed to the letter the splendid suggestions made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in arriving at a fair price for Louisiana sugars, and both of these gentlemen being in agreement that it was a "perfectly correct policy to designate a fair price," it follows that, with the elimination of the written contract to be used as prima facie evidence, the gentleman from Massachusetts and the Attorney General are in entire accord as to what was actually done in Louisiana, all of which goes to prove that "great minds run in the same channel."

FINDINGS OF COMMITTEE.

While the action of the Attorney General in Louisiana was finally indorsed and approved by the gentleman from Massachusetts, yet the majority members of the Subcommittee on the Judiciary do not entirely agree with him.

I can not take the time to discuss at length the reports of the majority and minority members of this committee, but certain portions of the majority report are so unjust and unfair, both to the Attorney General and the Louisiana producers, and are so much at variance with the evidence adduced before the committee, that I feel constrained to differ from some of the findings of the majority, who, I feel sure, did not mean to be unfair, but who have overlooked some most important and salient facts.

Among other things, the report contains this statement:

The Attorney General fixed said prices at a time when he considered them "rather high"; had just been advised by his representative in Louisiana, United States Attorney Henry Mooney, that such prices were in excess of the fair average price for the crop, and when he had reason to believe that the entire crop could be purchased at 14 or 15 cents per pound.

It is true that on November 5 District Attorney Mooney did wire the Attorney General that he thought at 17 cents some producers would make a large profit, but he stated in this same message that he was endeavoring to obtain all information possible and would report later.

After conferring with the consumers and producers and consulting and advising with ex-Senators Foster and Guion, he again wired the Attorney General on November 7 as follows:

My session with the planters was a protracted one and was held after I had talked with many of the leading consumers and obtained their views. The committee itself was composed largely of the most conservative element of planters, yet there was only one member of the committee originally consenting to 17 cents suggestion, all other members holding for a high price because of admitted short crop and low sugar yield, stating in this connection that such cane as had passed through the mill showed an unusually poor yield of sugar, making estimates of production a week ago high and indicating losses of money even at price agreed. I have sought the very best sources of advice in this matter and have reached the conclusion that the 17 cents agreed upon is reasonable and recommend that the department accept it—

And so forth.

It was not until the receipt of this information that the Attorney General wired the district attorney concurring in a maximum price of 17 cents. That the district attorney was correct in his analysis of the situation, and that the Attorney General was but fair and just when he accepted the recommendation of the district attorney, is fully substantiated by ample proof going to show that no excessive profits were made by the Louisiana producers.

This portion of the report makes the further statement that at the time the Attorney General agreed to a price of 17 cents he had reason to believe that the entire Louisiana crop could be purchased at 14 to 15 cents per pound. There is no evidence in the record to bear out any portion of this statement.

The Attorney General did state that he had heard that a representative of the producers had offered to sell the entire Louisiana output at 15 cents per pound, but he also stated that his information was that after the representative had returned to Louisiana and made some further investigation he discovered that he was wrong and withdrew this proposition. (See p. 171 of the hearings.)

As a matter of fact, no such offer was ever made.

The only witness who gave any such testimony before the committee was Mr. Zabriskie, who immediately admitted that he might be wrong, as appears from the following extract from the hearing.

Mr. ZABRISKIE. I felt at that time that the right attitude of the Attorney General was to notify Louisiana producers that profiteering would not be countenanced; that any man that profiteered in selling sugar would be prosecuted; and the reason we took this attitude was that the crop of Louisiana sugar had been practically offered to us at 15 cents——

Mr. GLASGOW. Well, I do not quite agree with you on that.

Mr. ZABRISKIE. Well, I may be wrong on that. I am subject to some correction. (Hearings, p. 106.)

Mr. Zabriskie was referring to an informal conference held by him and Judge Glasgow, also a member of the Sugar Equalization Board, in the office of Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana, for the purpose of discussing some basis upon which the Louisiana crop might be acquired by the Equalization Board.

This conference was based on the assumption that the Equalization Board was to be given some additional authority looking to the purchase of the Louisiana crop, and was with the clear and distinct understanding that the Louisiana producers, who were in Washington for the sole purpose of testifying before the McNary committee, were without authority to negotiate for the sale of the Louisiana crop.

Various prices were discussed as a basis for future negotiations, but at no time did the Louisiana representatives offer to sell the Louisiana crop at any figure; but, on the contrary, they stated that they were without any such authority and would have to take up the matter at a general meeting of the cane growers and sugar producers.

Immediately following this conference a general meeting of all producers and cane growers was called in the city of New Orleans, and it was the sense of that meeting, which was very generally attended, that governmental control should stop and the sugar producers should be permitted to sell their crop on the open market, permitting the price to be governed by the law of supply and demand.

If there be one fact that was clearly established before the Subcommittee on the Judiciary, it was that no offer was ever made to sell the Louisiana crop at 15 cents per pound, and the only witness who even suggested such an offer was Mr. Zabriskie, who admitted that he was possibly mistaken.

On the other hand, Judge Glasgow, a member of the Equalization Board; Judge R. E. Milling, E. A. Pharr, and E. F. Dickinson, all of whom were present at this informal conference, strenuously deny that any such offer was ever made. (See testimony of these gentlemen, pp. 231, 239, and 245 of the hearings.)

Again the majority report contains this statement:

Crop conditions in Louisiana during the year 1919 varied greatly in different parts of the State and on different plantations. In some cases the loss of crop was very heavy, in others it was comparatively light, so that a fixed price for sugar, which would yield only a fair and reasonable profit to the producer, whose cost of production did not exceed the general average for the State, would permit a certain class of producers to make excessive profits.

A statistical bulletin issued by the department on November 8 and printed in the hearings, on page 73, estimates the crop at from 38 to 80 per cent, and places the general average at 51 per cent of a normal crop. But since then the crop has been harvested and converted into sugar, and the actual figures of the Department of Agriculture show that only 40 per cent of a crop was made in Louisiana.

The report states that a certain class of producers made excessive profits.

While some producers did make a fair profit at the price agreed upon, yet many others lost considerable money, as was shown by witnesses who appeared before the committee and who gave facts and figures from various sections of the State showing that no excessive profits were made.

Mr. Mooney, the United States district attorney, who was in touch with the Louisiana situation, testified as follows in answer to a question asked by Mr. TINKHAM:

Mr. TINKHAM. According to your own statement, there would be some who would make under this very large profits.

Mr. MOONEY. Yes, sir. But subsequent facts developed that they did not. I thought that some of the cane growers would have a very good, fruitful year at this price. (Hearings, p. 279.)

The Louisiana producers not only did not profiteer in sugar or make exorbitant profits, but they actually accepted for their product much less than the market price.

In referring to a visit which some of the Louisiana producers paid the Attorney General for the purpose of discussion of the sugar situation the Attorney General says:

They had shown to me during their visit that at that time (October, 1919) they were receiving offers of 19, 20, 21, and 22 cents for their sugar. They showed to me contracts which had actually been executed by some of the sugar producers or refiners in Louisiana by which their sugar was sold at this price. They told me of inquiries from manufacturers and other consumers of sugar asking for sugar from New Orleans without regard to price, and they reported to me also what was the then prevailing price in New Orleans.

It is clear, therefore, that without the action on the part of the Attorney General, the Louisiana producers, owing to the shortage, were in a position to demand and obtain any price they pleased for their sugars, and they felt and believed that they were entitled to an open market, but rather than permit any of their number of be subjected to the charge of profiteering they acceded to a price several cents below that which prevailed at the time.

Let it be remembered that these are the same sugar producers, who, in 1918, when our country was at war, voluntarily and patriotically entered into an agreement with the United States Sugar Equalization Board by which they sold their sugar at 8.82 cents per pound, when Mr. Hoover stated that without this agreement they would have received from 25 to 30 cents a pound for their product.

Certainly the Attorney General can not be criticized for concurring in a price which at best only permitted a fair margin of profit to an industry that cheerfully and patriotically sacrificed millions when this country was at war.

If criticism there be, it should come from those who were deprived of a free and open market, and not from the consumers of sugar, who were saved many millions of dollars by the action of the Attorney General.

Again, the majority report states:

The legalistic method adopted by the Attorney General was wholly ineffective as a means of price control; it gave apparent governmental sanction to extremely high sugar prices, which excited the cupidity of Cuban producers and caused the advance in the Cuban market.

It can not be denied that the Cubans were guilty of "cupidity," but they would also have been guilty of stupidity if, after all these investigations, which not only increased the demand for sugar but gave the Cubans due and timely notice of the prospective shortage, they had not taken advantage of the situation and advanced their prices.

But it is ridiculously illogical to hold that the Cuban prices were advanced because of any action taken by the Attorney General in Louisiana. At the time that this official action in Louisiana was taken it was shown by the certificate of the secretary of the sugar exchange that all Louisiana sugars that had been marketed sold at from 20 to 22 cents per pound, and it is shown further that many producers had actually contracted for a part or the whole of their output at prices as high as 23 cents per pound.

If, therefore, the Cubans raised their prices because Louisiana was permitted to only receive 17 and 18 cents for their sugars, does it not necessarily follow that they would have raised their prices so much the higher if Louisiana had, by selling on an open market, received prices from 20 cents up?

Judge Glasgow, a member of the Sugar Equalization Board, in testifying before the Subcommittee on the Judiciary, stated very clearly and succinctly the reason for the advance in the Cuban market. He says:

The situation, Mr. Chairman, was such that the real thing that fixed the price of Cuban sugar, or had its effect on the price of the Cuban sugar, was the fact that there was a shortage and the fact that the Louisianian could get from 15 to 20 cents for his sugar if he wanted it. It was not the fact, as far as I can see, that any agreement was made with them or any telegram sent to Louisiana "That we won't prosecute you if you don't charge more than 17 cents." Because if that had not been sent and the Louisiana crop had all gone wild at from 15 to 20 and 21 cents that would have had an effect on the Cuban crop much more than the 17 cents which was finally arranged with them. That was the situation.

The Cubans were influenced by general market conditions, but these conditions were brought about by the demand for sugar created by the prediction, made by the experts who appeared before committees in the House and Senate, that there would be a sugar famine in 1920 and resulted in a wild scramble on the part of the manufacturers and consumers of this country to lay in a supply of sugar, thereby depleting and bulling the market.

POSITION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

But little, if any, reference is made in the majority report to the splendid, forceful, and convincing statement made by the Attorney General with reference to his action in Louisiana.

This official gave the committee a full history of all of the facts and circumstances which prompted him to act and laid before the committee the telegrams and correspondence between himself and the district attorney at New Orleans, which set forth the facts and circumstances which made him feel that it was incumbent upon him to act.

He called the committee's attention to the fact that when he appeared before the Committee on Agriculture of the House asking for an amendment to the Lever Act he frankly told this committee that if this proposed amendment became the law he expected to adopt the very policy that was followed in Louisiana, thereby making it possible for honest men to continue to do their business without danger of being subjected to prosecution for crime.

He explained that he had formed fair-price committees all over the country for the purpose of announcing to the communities what, in view of all the facts and circumstances, seemed to be a just and reasonable price on various commodities, and that this policy had been followed in New York, Chicago, and all the large cities in establishing and holding down the price of food and clothing; that because of the resignation of Mr. Parker as food administrator in Louisiana he had no fair-price committee in that State, and the United States attorney was therefore instructed to advise and consult with representatives of the consumers, the producers, and the general public in order to arrive at a fair and equitable solution of the sugar problem.

No one who reads the following portion of the Attorney General's statement can doubt that his action in Louisiana was prompted by the highest motives, by a sense of what he considered was his official duty under the law, and by a bona fide effort to render a service to the American consumers:

Now, when we took that position; when we announced, after consultation with consumers and producers and the public, that 17 cents would be considered by us a fair price; when I took the responsibility which the law laid upon me of saying that I would prosecute persons who sold above that price and try to convict them—even if I said, which I did not say in words, that we would not prosecute men who charged less than that price—when we took that position we released the Louisiana sugar to the market at a less price, by many millions of dollars in the total, than otherwise it would have been charged for to the American public.

We allowed no guilty man to escape on any charge of profiteering, and we did not subject the innocent man to any of the annoyances of a trial in court under a criminal statute. We did our duty, it seems to me, to the public interested as consumers and to the defendants, or possible or potential defendants, in these criminal cases.

And let me remind you, sir, that it is the duty of a prosecuting officer not alone to consider the interests of the Government and of the prosecution side of the controversy in every criminal case, but it is his duty, under every decision that I have ever seen, to consider also the rights of the individuals who may be brought into court as defendants.

I would have hated myself, Mr. Chairman, and I would have despised the methods pursued by this great, free Government of ours, if, having determined in my heart that 17 cents was a fair price, I had held it locked in my own bosom and refused to tell the public in Louisiana that that was what the Department of Justice would hold.

I can not believe that the United States proposes to move on any such principle as that. Certainly it never will while I am Attorney General of the United States.

FAILURE TO PURCHASE THE CUBAN CROP.

The failure to purchase the 1920 Cuban crop by this Government is the generally accepted reason why the price of sugar has advanced to such an unusual figure, and for this both the President and the Congress have been blamed.

A brief review of the facts will show that Congress must assume some of the responsibility, not because of its failure to pass the necessary legislation, because none was needed, but because by the constant agitation of this question our refiners were kept out of the Cuban market.

The United States Sugar Equalization Board originated with the Food Administration and it was incorporated, with the President as the sole and only stockholder, for the purpose of buying the Cuban crop and controlling the sugar market during the war.

All of the powers of the board are derived from the Lever Act, and this act is still in full force and effect to-day. In July of last year the Cuban sugar producers wrote the Equalization Board that they were prepared to sell this Government their entire Cuban crop if this Government desired to purchase it.

The board held a meeting, and on August 14 addressed a letter to the President inclosing the Cuban offer, and recommending that the Cuban crop be purchased. Mr. Taussig, a member of the Equalization Board, dissented from the views of the majority of the board in a separate memorandum, recommending that governmental control should be relinquished and stating that if the price of sugar was to be specifically controlled so should that of bread, meat, and clothing.

The Secretary to the President acknowledged receipt of these communications, stating that they would be brought to the attention of the President.

On September 20 the Equalization Board again wrote the President, directing his attention to their first communication and stating that unless action was taken at once they would be unable to purchase the Cuban crop.

Receipt of this letter was also acknowledged by the Secretary to the President, but no action was taken by the President himself. On September 22, the Cuban producers withdrew their offer to sell, and on the following day the board wrote the President, stating that the situation was out of hand and that they had therefore advised the American sugar refiners as to conditions, so that they might purchase raw sugars as in prewar times.

If, when the Equalization Board notified the President that the situation was out of hand, and at the same time authorized the American refiners to enter the Cuban market and purchase raw sugars, the matter had ended there, the American refiners would have at once entered the Cuban market and forthwith entered into contracts for the purchase of the 1920 Cuban crop.

Several days later, on October 3, Mr. Zabriskie testified before the Senate Committee on Agriculture that the Cuban crop could still be purchased at from 6½ to 7 cents per pound.

If it could be purchased by the Government for that price, it certainly could have been purchased by the refiners for the same price or even less, because the Government always pays higher for anything it purchases than does an individual.

But unfortunately for the American consumers the matter did not end with Mr. Zabriskie's notification to the President and the refiners.

On September 27 a resolution was introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, calling for an investigation of the sugar shortage, prices, and whether any legislation was necessary.

A subcommittee from the Committee on Agriculture began hearings on this resolution on October 3, which resulted in the introduction of what is known as the McNary bill, which had for its purpose the granting of authority to the Equalization Board to purchase the Cuban crop.

The immediate effect of this bill was to cause the American refiners to stop all negotiations looking to the purchase of the Cuban crop, as they were waiting to see what the policy of the Government would be.

The McNary bill was pending in Congress for about three months and was not signed by the President until December 31; and in the meantime, while the American refiners kept out of the market pending a determination of whether or not this Government would purchase the Cuban crop, foreign Governments and individuals did not, and as a result the price of Cuban sugars rapidly advanced.

I concede that the McNary bill was introduced and passed with the best of intentions, but it still remains that had no legislation been introduced and the matter agitated for several months before Congress, the Cuban crop could have been purchased by the refiners at 6½ cents to 7 cents per pound, and sold to the consumers of this country at a fair margin of profit.

I do not for one moment contend that the purchase of the Cuban crop by the Equalization Board would not have accomplished the same result and have offered the same relief. The Board, however, contended that they needed some additional legislative authority, a contention with which I do not agree, because all of their powers are derived from the Lever Act, which was the law then and is the law to-day, and there was no legal reason why the Cuban crop could not have been purchased at the time it was offered to this Government in the summer of 1919.

I do contend, however, that the offer to sell the Cuban crop to this country having been withdrawn and the refiners having been authorized to negotiate for the crop, it would have been in the interest of the consumers to have permitted the refiners to acquire the Cuban crop at 6½ or 7 cents a pound rather than to keep the whole matter in abeyance by its agitation before Congress for three months.

However, I agree with Dr. Taussig that while there may have been some excuse for this Government, under stress of war, to engage in a huge commercial venture of this kind, yet governmental control and price fixing should cease when we are at peace.

Moreover—

the regulation of the price of sugar can not, in my judgment, stand alone. The whole relation of Government to industry in time of peace is involved. If the price of sugar is to be specifically controlled, so should that of bread, of meat, of clothing. In the main, we must look for a remedy to the natural development of production and to the return of the entire world to normal financial and economic conditions.

CONSUMPTION AND SUPPLY.

As a matter of fact, there is no cause for alarm over our sugar supply if the consumers of this country will only confine their purchases to actual needs.

No one will contend that more sugar was actually consumed in this country for the first four months of this year than was ever consumed in a like period in its history.

In the face of the fact that at times sugar could not be purchased for any price in many sections of the United States or could only be purchased in very limited quantities, statistics show that during the first four months of this year sugar which has passed into the channels of consumption amounted to 1,552,000 long tons, or approximately 33 pounds per capita. If this rate of consumption continues throughout the year, it would mean an average per capita consumption of 100 pounds of sugar, which is 14 per cent more than was consumed in 1919, 27 per cent more than in 1918, and 16 per cent more than was ever consumed in this country before the war.

As a matter of fact, this sugar has not been actually consumed, but has been stored up by manufacturers and housewives who were stampeded as a result of the numerous investigations and predictions of a sugar famine.

Attracted by the prices in the American market, sugar is being shipped here from most unusual sources. Argentina, Peru, Java, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, and Holland are shipping a sufficient amount of sugar into this country to in a great measure offset the Cuban shortage.

A survey of our sugar supply for the balance of this year discloses that we will have available sugar from the following sources:

	Short tons.
Unsold and unmanufactured Cuban crop	1,450,000
Unused portion Hawaiian crop	296,000
Unsold portion Porto Rican crop	232,000
Undistributed beet crop, 1919–20	85,000
Philippine, Argentina, Peru, and other sugars	300,000
New beet crop, which will be distributed before January 1, 1921	400,000
New Louisiana crop, which will be distributed before January 1, 1921	250,000
Total	3,013,000

This amount of sugar will give the American people 60 pounds per person for the remaining eight months of the year, or a little more than 7½ pounds per month.

This is an ample supply to meet all reasonable demands, especially in view of the fact that the Department of Justice has taken steps to curtail the use of sugar in nonessential industries and rationing of the use of sugar at hotels and restaurants.

PROPOSED REMEDIES.

The legislative hopper has been filled with bills supposedly introduced for the purpose of meeting and adjusting the sugar situation, though most of the bills were designed for home consumption rather than with the view of proposing some really remedial and constructive legislation.

There is, however, pending in the United States Senate, with a favorable report from the Committee on Agriculture, a bill, S. 4420, which proposes to place an embargo on the shipment of sugar from this country. I know that the author of that bill is sincere in his belief that it will at least have a tendency to relieve the sugar situation, but an analysis of the provisions of the bill, and its undoubted effect, if unfortunately it should become a law, shows that it will prove a boomerang, and will increase rather than diminish the price of sugar.

The bill provides that no sugar should be exported from or sent or taken out of this country, except raw sugar owned by foreign nations or their nationals, imported for refining on toll, and refined sugar made therefrom.

I desire to warn the membership of this House that should this bill become a law, it will not only fail to accomplish its purpose, but will both diminish our supply and materially increase the price of sugar.

The immediate effect of this bill will be that the European Governments, who are suffering much more for the want of sugar than we are, will begin to bid for next year's Cuban crop.

Cuba being the chief source of supply, foreign Governments will be compelled to act at once as a matter of protection, and there will be a wild scramble on the part of foreign Governments to purchase Cuban sugar long before it is manufactured.

The result will be that the Cubans will begin at once to sell their product for future delivery and at any price that they may demand, because foreign Governments will not stand idly by and see this supply entirely taken from them.

Not only is this true, but the seaboard sugar refineries, in whose interest the bill will operate, will cater to the foreign rather than to the domestic trade, because they are only allowed 2 cents margin for sugar refined for domestic consumption, while there is no limit to what they may charge for refining sugar on toll for foreign Governments or their citizens.

Let us not forget that the refiners who import raw sugar from Cuba for domestic consumption must pay a duty, but they get a refund of 99 per cent of the duty when such sugar is exported.

Refiners would, therefore, much rather refine sugar for account of some foreign Government or one of its citizens, first, because there is no limit to the toll they may charge, and, second, because at the same margin, they would prefer the foreign trade because they get a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty.

This bill will open the door to fraud, collusion, and speculation.

It means that nearly all of the sugar imported into the country will be in the name of some foreigner, and then after the sugar has been refined it will either be held for a higher price or exported to some foreign country at an exorbitant price.

It will encourage hoarding, because the man who holds sugar in the name of some foreigner can not be reached under the law.

It will be an invitation to foreign citizens to purchase the Cuban crop, refine it in this country, and then hold it for higher prices.

It has never been the policy of this Government to place an embargo on any of its products except in the time of war.

It is a precedent, which, if adopted, means trouble in the future. If perchance there should be a failure in the cotton crop, would our friends from the South favor an embargo on cotton, or would our friends from the North and West favor an embargo on wheat, corn, or meat?

THE ONLY REMEDY.

The remedy for the sugar shortage does not lie in an embargo or in any other legislation. Not a pound of sugar can be produced by legislation, nor can the production of sugar be increased by attempting to put the sugar producers in jail.

The remedy lies in encouraging production and repealing all war legislation and giving free rein to the great law of supply and demand.

Did We Win the War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. FLOOD,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago this House passed a resolution, No. 78, authorizing the Speaker to appoint a committee of 15 Members to investigate all contracts and expenditures made by the War Department or under its direction during the war. A committee, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] was chairman, was accordingly appointed and for the proper division of its work organized itself into five subcommittees. To subcommittee No. 3, of which the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] was chairman, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] and myself were members, was assigned the investigation of expenditures made abroad, whether for supplies or construction of camps or other purposes. From the very beginning the purpose of the majority of this subcommittee was apparent. It ignored its instructions, which limited it to the investigation of expenditures in Europe. But it assumed the power to investigate the conduct of the war both at home and abroad, and it was determined to find something on which to base a criticism of the administration and our armies. It sought out those persons who had grievances and refused to call those persons who could give intelligent and reliable testimony. My requests, made month after month, that certain important witnesses be called, were met with favorable promises by the chairman, none of which were ever fulfilled. Before and since April 15, the day of the last meeting of the subcommittee to take testimony, I have been waiting to present Gen. Pershing, Gen. Dawes, the chiefs of supply services, and others, until three days ago, when I was astounded to receive a copy of a report by the majority, with a notice that I would have three days to prepare a minority report.

The full committee of 15 at a meeting to-day refused to accept the majority report. And the gentlemen from South Dakota and Indiana found their year's efforts unacceptable to their colleagues irrespective of party. Knowing that neither the full committee nor this House will ever sanction his report, the gentleman from South Dakota has just given it to the press, and I feel that in justice to the great Army which we sent to the World War and the splendid men who commanded it in its various branches some answer should be made to that publication. I shall not in these remarks attempt to answer many of the allegations of the majority of the subcommittee, founded as they largely are on the testimony of unreliable witnesses or on no evidence whatsoever, but shall address myself to the method of investigation in order that the future student of our part in that war may attach to the subcommittee report the negative value which it has.

Having determined to attack the War Department, the subcommittee hired for its counsel an Army officer, Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell, who had gained much notoriety by his violent defamation of the Secretary of War, and rewarded him with a salary exceeding by four times his compensation as an Army officer. The subcommittee even went so far as to delegate its powers to this counsel, permitting him to examine witnesses when no member of the committee was present, and to conduct the investigation in defiance of myself when I was the only member present. Instead of confining his investigation to the field of jurisdiction of the subcommittee, war expenditures abroad, as it was his duty as counsel to do, this ex-officer applied himself exclusively to the purpose of discrediting the War Department and the persons with whom he had quarreled. His investigation related neither to the matter of expenditures nor the activities of our forces abroad. The only purpose his employment served was his own—to air his grievances and malign the Secretary of War and high officers of the Army. No greater mistake has ever been made by a committee of Congress than the employment of this former Government servant who as counsel for Bergdoll has recently brought about that notorious draft dodger's escape by his representations and promises to the War Department.

The subcommittee alleges as an excuse for its failure to investigate expenditures that the War Department maintained an unfriendly attitude toward the investigation and that the records of expenditures were not available. I do not know of any facts upon which this excuse can be based. Possibly the majority of the subcommittee had in mind the occasion, after the subcommittee had been in France some weeks, when the majority demanded of Gen. Pershing on the very day the general was leaving Paris that he appear before the subcommittee to testify, which he, of course, firmly but courteously refused to do. Had the majority of the subcommittee desired to interrogate Gen. Pershing they could have done so at any time in the past nine months. The only other occasion when this subcommittee's effort to obtain information has in any way been thwarted by the action of the military authorities was in January, when two gentlemen appeared at the War Department with a letter from the subcommittee's counsel, Mr. Ansell, requesting that they have access to certain files. The designs of these persons were known to the Secret Service, which had a copy of a letter written by one of them to the other, from which it was evident that they were conspiring to obtain the information for the purpose of selling it to a newspaper at large profit unless other interested parties would pay them more for withholding the information. The fact is that all the military authorities have been ready and anxious at all times to appear before the committee, to produce records, and to testify as to any facts that it may desire to know.

This subcommittee sat for nearly a year. It took more than 4,000 pages of printed testimony, only a small part of which could by any stretch of the imagination be connected with any inquiry into overseas expenditures, the one and only subject the subcommittee was appointed to investigate. It should be a matter of much humiliation to this House that on November 4, 1919, a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate—holding hearings on matters of Army organization—learned more in one hour concerning the expenditures of our Army in Europe than this committee has found out in a year. At that hearing Gen. Charles G. Dawes, general purchasing agent of the American Expeditionary Forces, explained the methods adopted in France to coordinate purchases and obtain the necessary supplies at a minimum of expense.

It appeared from his testimony that of the 17,000,000 ship tons of war material required by our Army in Europe, over 10,000,000 ship tons were purchased abroad; that almost immediately after the arrival of the first detachments of our troops a general purchasing board was organized, of which Gen. Dawes was the head and upon which there was a representative of each of the services of supply; that no purchase exceeding 5,000 francs was made without the approval of the general purchasing board as to material and price; that the prices were subject to the approval of the French Government, which in its own interests, if for no other reason, endeavored to maintain the price of war material as low as possible; and when exorbitant prices were asked the French Government requisitioned the material at a fair price and turned it over to the United States at cost. It was not possible for an American officer to make either a fraudulent or extravagant purchase for more than a nominal amount, even if he were disposed so to do. Neither the investigation of this subcommittee nor the investigations on the part of the War Department have disclosed fraudulent transactions, except possibly in a case of small importance in Switzerland. This is the first great war in which the United States has engaged that has not been the occasion of large fraudulent transactions between greedy contractors and dishonest officers of the Government. The adoption of this economic and efficient system of purchase did not take place, as the subcommittee report says, after the "system of supply had broken down or was about to." It was adopted in August, 1917, when the activities of our Army abroad were in the beginning.

The majority members and their counsel sought throughout the proceedings, but with no success, to develop differences between our high command abroad and the Secretary of War. They would have been spared this unfortunate failure had they read these simple sentences which I quote from page 95 of Gen. Pershing's final report as commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces:

> In closing this report, Mr. Secretary, I desire to record my deep appreciation of the unqualified support accorded me throughout the war by the President and yourself. My task was simplified by your confidence and wise counsel.

The majority report attempted to condemn the accounting system of the American Expeditionary Forces. It may be that this system is defective; but it is the one fixed by acts of Congress and the decisions of the Treasury Department thereon; and the subcommittee could make no constructive suggestions for its improvement. It was designed primarily to prevent fraud, and the investigation by this subcommittee proves that it accomplished that purpose if it proves anything.

The majority in their discredited report allege gross waste of funds and property. In the full knowledge that the American people would countenance no attempt to discount the battle efforts of our Army in measuring them by the standard of dollars and cents the majority report limited its accusations of waste and extravagance to the period after the armistice. Thus it alleged that much of the property sold in France after the armistice might have been brought home with a commercial profit; but the majority ignores the fact, though it is established in the record, that such a reshipment would have delayed by months the return of our soldiers. Certainly no soldier nor mother of a soldier can be expected to have patience with men who are so inconsiderate of the home ties as to imply that we should have held our boys in service in a foreign land for the sake of paltry dollars and cents.

The majority of the subcommittee openly accuse the Secretary of War, and by insinuation Gen. Pershing, of deliberately encouraging wasteful and extravagant methods following the armistice. So far from this being true, the facts are that the policies both of Secretary Baker and Gen. Pershing constitute the finest chapters that public servants have ever written into the history of Government economy. The facts could have been incorporated in full in the record had the majority allowed me to produce the witnesses who had knowledge of the facts. I desire to incorporate here official papers which constitute a statement of the beginning of policies from which neither the Secretary of War nor Gen. Pershing ever departed.

On November 11, 1918—the day of the armistice—Gen. Pershing sent the following telegram to the commanding general, Services of Supply:

> No. M-844. In view of the armistice which has been concluded today, the American Expeditionary Forces are confronted with the immediate necessity of adjusting its policy to conform to the new conditions created. The American people have been generous and self-sacrificing beyond expression in the devotion of their means and resoures to the support of our Armies. The Army owes it as a sacred duty to them to curtail in every possible way the expenditures necessary in preparation for war, but which in view of the new conditions may be materially reduced. As long as our troops are in Europe, certain classes of work and supply procurement must continue exactly as in the past, but there are certain other classes of expenditure which should immediately cease. Each chief of service is hereby instructed to make immediate reommendations to the commanding general, Services of Supply, as to what projects and constructive activity in his special department are now made nonessential. In the meantime, where in the judgment of the chief of service there is no doubt whatever that continuance of certain construction or purchasing activities are unnecessary under the changed conditions they will be discontinued, and the facts reported to the commanding general, Services of Supply, who will then confirm or revise their action. Inform each chief of service.

A cablegram received by Mr. Stettinius, on November 12, from Secretary Baker was as follows:

> In view of the signature of the armistice, it is, of course, important to cut down expenditures as rapidly as possible. Please get into immediate communication with Gen. Harbord and with Gen. Pershing's headquarters and represent me in working out with them a program for the cessation of all construction and procurement which can be stopped without prejudice to the situation as it now is. Contracts in process of making, both in England and France, should be suspended, and generally every effort to narrow our obligations as far as possible.

Under general orders of the Services of Supply, issued on November 14, 1918, and based on the telegram and cable which I have just read, all the various activities of the Services of Supply were curtailed in every possible way, both by directing the abandonment or modification of construction projects and of proposed purchases, and by the cancellation or modification of outstanding contracts and purchase orders for supplies. In his final report as commanding general, Services of Supply, Gen. Harbord estimated that the amount saved by this order was above $1,222,000,000, and I have no doubt but that even this stupendous sum is below the mark.

At the close of hostilities there was considerable property, of course, that had become unserviceable for military purposes and was useless for any other purpose. Some of it might have had a small value had it been in the United States, but not enough to justify its shipment. In accordance with the economic principles adopted by the American Expeditionary Forces, as I have indicated, this property was destroyed. The majority of the subcommittee seized upon each case of such destruction as its opportunity to show a reckless disregard on the part of the military authorities for the financial interest of the Government. As an illustration, it condemned on most uncertain evidence the burning of aeroplanes at Colombey-les-Belles and alluded to the same as "the million-dollar fire." It refused to receive the affidavit of Gen. Patrick, chief of the Air Service in France, on this matter, though on other occasions it accepted and used as a basis for its conclusions every kind of statement and rumor that fit its purpose. Gen. Patrick has been in Washington for many months, but I have not been permitted to bring him before the subcommittee. It is regretted that the subcommittee did not exercise a little more caution and endeavor to coordinate its work with other subcommittees. Subcommittee No. 1—on aviation—did examine Gen. Patrick on this very subject and presumably on his testimony and that of others in position to know found that the destruction of such aeroplanes was wise and prudent.

The subcommittee sought as witnesses on chemical warfare only those members of the Gas Service staff whose unbalanced enthusiasm for their own arm might be expected to outweigh any sense of proportion. Thus the committee has sought to deceive itself with totally false ideas of the relative importance of gas and other troops, as well as of gas and other means of destruction. It ignores the fact that we furnished an enormous quantity of gas to our allies, and that from beginning to end this Government secured and furnished our troops all means of gas warfare and all gas supplies in the maximum quantities used by any of the allied armies.

In making much ado over shortage in motor transportation, the majority ignored the fact that it is in evidence in the record that such shortages were primarily due to the lack of adequate sea transportation. No army has ever before been supplied as generously in all the essentials as was the American Expeditionary Forces. No doubt the shortages in motor transport caused much anxiety at our higher headquarters, but the fact remains that the American soldier received rations, munitions, and care for the sick and wounded to a degree of perfection never before attained in all the history of war.

Without deigning to ask a single question of anyone competent to give the reasons therefor, the majority also assumed to criticize the shipment of motor transportation to Europe after the armistice. Such shipments were made on very proper requests from the Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces. Conditions immediately following the armistice were exceedingly uncertain. There was no foretelling the time which would be required to make peace, and it may not be amiss to point out that the United States have not to this day made peace. The railroad situation was extremely serious, due to the necessity for diverting a large proportion of the existing railroad stock to the devastated and evacuated regions. The attitude of the Germans was uncertain, and remains so, and the American Expeditionary Forces had, under agreement with Marshal Foch, approved by the War Department, to prepare to employ 30 combat divisions in operations of a character to make greater demands than ever before on motor transportation. Under such circumstances the sending of additional transportation to France was a wise and necessary precaution.

In the matter of machine guns the majority endeavored first to condemn the experiments necessary to the development of the Browning gun and then to show the undoubted superiority of that gun. Their pseudo report not only calmly ignores the fact that our troops were always adequately provided both with machine guns and automatic rifles, but displays inexcusable ignorance of the difference between these two important weapons.

The underlying idea of the majority's attempted report on the matter of medals is found in the resentment of the majority's attorney of the failure of those in authority to approve all awards recommended by him, and the airing in this connection of his personal differences with, not to say disloyalty to, his former chief. Characterizing as sophists all those who do not agree with the radical ideas of the majority's attorney, the attempt is made to insinuate that the law governing medals was deliberately misconstrued in order that such recompense might be forbidden to junior officers and soldiers. As a matter of fact, the evidence taken by the committee shows that the greatest thought was given to the construction of the law, both with reference to the distinguished service medal and the distinguished service cross. In order to cover the cases not coming within the provisions of the law with reference to the duty of great responsibility, the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces issued citation certificates to some 1,000 junior officers and 1,600 enlisted men for exceptionally meritorious services.

A careful examination of the wording of the law with reference to the distinguished service cross makes it clear that this decoration was only intended to be awarded for heroic deeds in action. About 1,550 junior officers and 3,800 enlisted men were awarded the distinguished service cross, and about 1,200 junior officers and 3,500 enlisted men were cited for gallantry in general headquarters orders alone, and in addition many thousands were cited in Army corps and division orders, which, under the law, authorizes a silver star on the victory medal ribbon.

Certainly the above figures and the fact that the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces are still considering and recommending awards of distinguished service medals, the distinguished service cross, and citation certificates do not indicate a desire on the part of any authority to deny appropriate recognition to any officer or soldier. On the contrary, there is abundant evidence to show that it has always been, and is to-day, the desire of the authorities in every case to make appropriate awards under the provisions of the law.

It is in evidence that the boards of officers gave the most careful and painstaking consideration to the many recommendations received and called before them officers having knowledge of the circumstances, sent officers out to investigate the facts, and did everything humanly possible to obtain full and complete information on which to base their awards.

The mere fact that the majority report attempts to question the right of Gens. Pershing, March, Bliss, Liggett, and Bullard to the distinguished service medal is in itself sufficient to discredit everything the majority have to say on the subject of medals.

The methods of this subcommittee are well illustrated in its treatment of Gen. W. W. Harts, commanding officer of the district of Paris. Considerable testimony was taken by the subcommittee before it went to Europe in the summer of 1919 concerning Gen. Harts's administration, with special reference to the arrest of United States soldiers in Paris, and the committee devoted much of its time while in Europe to the investigation of this subject. Gen. Harts requested permission to appear as a witness before the subcommittee while it was in Europe, but his request was ignored and the subcommittee returned to the United States without taking his testimony. It seemed to me that the subcommittee intended to hold Gen. Harts responsible for alleged mistreatment of United States soldiers under his command without giving him any opportunity to be heard in his own behalf, such responsibility being based largely upon statements of men who had been convicted of serious offenses. Indeed, it did this very thing in respect to Col. Hegeman, the commanding officer of the big motor reconstruction park at Verneuil. In order that such injustice might not be done to Gen. Harts, the Secretary of War, on his own initiative, ordered him to return to this country in March of this year, and he appeared before the subcommittee at the request of the Secretary of War. He completely vindicated himself, and the evidence taken proved that his record as commanding general of the district of Paris was one of which every true American should be proud.

It is, of course, true that some of our soldiers guilty of minor or no offenses were arrested and detained until their cases could be investigated. It is also true that a few, a very few, and those few not the most innocent, prisoners were abused, but every effort was made to prevent such treatment and to punish those responsible for such abuse.

In the immense armies which we sent to Europe there were some criminals and skulkers. Most of those found their way to Paris, and it became absolutely necessary to arrest every man in that city who could not show clear and unmistakable authority for being there. Even those unjustly detained recognized the necessity for this, and the men who stuck unflinchingly to their fox holes amid the storm and crash of shell and shrapnel, who froze by night and swarmed to the attack by day, that Germany might be debarred from her purpose of enslaving the world, can be expected to waste but scant sympathy on those who now bewail the fact that the criminals and thugs who skulked in Paris were not provided with feather beds.

The majority Members charge our leaders with "a reckless disregard of the lives of our soldiers" on armistice day, basing their accusations on the fact that the Commander in Chief of the American Armies and the commanding generals of the First and Second Armies transmitted the armistice instructions precisely as they were received from Marshal Foch. Not only were these instructions the only ones that these commanders could with any propriety or safety issue, but they were identical with those given by the commander in chief of the British Armies—Marshal Haig—and the commander in chief of the French Armies in France—Marshal Petain.

No advances were inaugurated after receipt of the notice of the armistice and all hostilities were stopped as early as practicable considering the circumstances and the fact that many organizations were in action on receipt of the notice. Of all the witnesses who testified concerning hostilities on November 11, only two have voiced any criticism. One of these was in a division serving under French command, and the other had been characterized by his division commander as "personally undisciplined, disobedient, and unfit to command a brigade." The truth is that no American soldier lost his life unnecessarily, and regrettable as the death of any soldier is, those who may possibly have been killed after the receipt of the armistice notice gave their lives in the same great cause as did those who went before. In their efforts to sustain this unjust criticism the majority inserts in its report the official list of casualties for November 11, 1918, amounting to 268 killed and about 3,600 wounded, as if such were the number occurring after the receipt of the armistice notice. These numbers cover all casualties reported after midnight of November 10-11, and in no way indicate what number occurred in the closing hours of hostilities.

Without a word of testimony in the record to support it, the statement is made that a general order in the American Expeditionary Forces forbade privates to associate with Army or Red Cross nurses. The truth is that instructions to this effect having been issued by an officer of the Medical Department and being in effect in certain hospitals, Gen. Pershing caused them to be revoked as soon as he learned of their existence.

When we entered the war our allies, while expressing the hope that we might have 500,000 men in Europe during 1918, doubted our ability to maintain a great army overseas. In January of 1918 the British commander in chief—Sir Douglas Haig—discounted any real assistance from American troops during 1918, stating that the British experience had demonstrated that it required at least 15 months to produce an effective division, 9 months training at home and 6 months training in France. The Germans expressed a threefold belief: First, that America could not organize a great army; second, that such an army could not be transported to France; third, that even if large numbers of American troops reached France they could not be effective. But America did raise huge armies, and on the 11th of November, 1918, she had sent 2,000,000 men across 3,000 miles of submarine-infested seas. In all history there is no such record of accomplishment. No other nation has ever sent one-quarter of such forces such a distance. Far surpassing the most optimistic expectations of our allies or ourselves, America's fighting men were greater in numbers and were holding a greater front on November 11, 1918, than the British armies in France and Belgium, and millions of Americans were following those who had gone before. Friend and foe alike testify to the efficiency of the American Army and the American soldier. It is sufficient here to point out that in the defense no American division lost ground intrusted to it except locally, and then only for a few hours, and no American division failed in attack.

If half of what the majority of the subcommittee says in its report were true, the United States could have played no effective part in the prosecution of the war. But we know it is not true. We know that the American effort and the American soldier brought the war to a successful close a full year earlier than the most hopeful dared expect, and that by this effort hundreds of thousands of lives and billions of dollars were saved.

In view of the magnitude of the task undertaken by America and her accomplishments, it is probable that mistakes more or less serious were made. But this subcommittee has not discovered them. An investigation for the purpose of finding out mistakes and correcting them might have been helpful. But such an investigation as this, if taken seriously, can have no other effect than to discourage and embarrass any effort our armies may have to make in the future.

No report of subcommittee No. 3 could have altered the historical facts which record the accomplishments of our armies, but this Congress has been saved from ridicule by the unprecedented, but more than warranted, action of the Republican colleagues of the gentlemen from South Dakota and Indiana on the full committee in voting not to accept the report submitted by these gentlemen.

OF

HON. DAVID H. KINCHELOE,

OF KENTUCKY.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, within a few hours the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which is in the control of the Republicans, will go into history. In view of the dismal failure the Republicans of this Congress have made in failing to enact any constructive legislation or to place this country on a peace basis prompts me to draw a contrast between the achievements of the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses under the control of the Democrats and this, the Sixty-sixth Congress, under the control of the Republicans.

During the six years from March 4, 1913, to March 4, 1919, Democratic Congresses, with a Democratic President, enacted more constructive legislation for the good of the people of this country than the Republican Party did in 50 years before.

One of the greatest acts passed by a Democratic Congress and signed by a Democratic President was the Federal reserve banking act. The archaic banking system we had under the Republican administration permitted all the surplus money of the country to be concentrated in the banks of New York and under the control of about 18 millionaires and bankers who could bring about a panic in this country in 24 hours at their will. When the Democrats came into control of Congress they passed the Federal reserve banking act, under the provision of which this country was laid off into 12 regional banking districts, in each of which was located a Federal reserve bank, which receives and controls the surplus money in their respective districts and thereby prevents the hoarding of the surplus in the banks of Wall Street and taking this "blessed power" to order panics from the hands of these millionaires. It has proven a blessing to the business interests of the country, and if this law had not been on the statute books when we declared war against the Imperial Government of Germany, in my judgment, we would have had the worst panic in history.

The Democratic Congress when in power enacted the rural-credits bill, which established 12 farm-loan banks in each of the 12 farm-loan districts throughout the United States. Under the provisions of this act a farmer has the right to borrow money from these banks for a term of 40 years if he desires and at the rate of 5½ per cent interest. In the short time that this law has been upon the statute books of the United States the farmers of this country have borrowed from these banks $335,018,076. Notwithstanding the Republican Party being in power for practically 50 years before the Democratic Party got control of Congress, yet they passed no law which would permit the farmer to borrow money from his Government.

The Democratic Congress passed the good roads bill. I am proud to say the first day I was sworn in as a Member of the Sixty-fourth Congress I introduced a good roads bill very similar to the law which we now have, and I do not think I am immodest in saying that I worked as hard and did as much to assist in enacting this law as any other Member of Congress. The original bill appropriated $75,000,000, to be expended by the States within five years, contingent upon the fact that each State appropriate a like sum for good road purposes.

During the third session of the Sixty-fifth Democratic Congress we amended the original good roads act by appropriating $200,000,000 more for the building of good roads on the same conditions as the original act. As a direct result of the passage of this law, miles of hard road have been constructed in almost every State of the Union. Did anyone ever hear of a good roads law under a Republican administration?

During a Democratic administration this country declared, fought, and won the greatest war in behalf of civilization and free government since the tide of time began. I am happy to say that during that war boys of Republican parents rendered that same patriotic service to their country as the boys of Democratic parents. They stood loyal to their great President, who is the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and upheld his administration in every way. But, I am sorry to say, Republican Members of the House and Senate did not do so. They exerted every concentrated effort possible to embarrass the President and his administration while this great war was on.

In the congressional campaign of 1918 Republican candidates for Congress and Senate went to the people of the country and pledged themselves, if elected, to stand loyal to and uphold the hands of our great President. At that election a majority of the membership of the House and Senate elected were Republicans, and it was a sad day for this country when they got control. When the Sixty-fifth Congress expired by law on the 4th of March, 1919, these Republican Members of the House and Senate set up a cry that the President should come home and cease his duties around the peace table in Paris and call the Sixty-sixth Congress into extra session in order that this Republican Congress might enact great constructive legislation, repeal the war-time acts, and amend the revenue laws, which were enacted for war purposes.

The President did come home and called the Sixty-sixth Republican Congress into extra session on the 19th day of May, 1919. Congress has been in session under the control of the Republicans practically ever since that time, and I challenge any Republican Member of this House to-day to point to me one law of constructive legislation which has been enacted by this Congress. The President in two messages to this Congress appealed to the Republican Members of the House and Senate to revise the revenue laws by eliminating the obnoxious taxing features of same, to repeal war-time legislation, and to enact legislation which would deal forcibly to reduce the high cost of living. Yet this Republican Congress turned a deaf ear to these requests and nothing has been done and the prices of the necessities of life have gone higher.

Shortly after this Republican Congress convened on the 19th of May the Republican membership began to play politics. They continued to criticize and heckle the President. They created about 67 investigating committees to investigate the expenditures of the war and other activities of the Democratic administration, and these committees have expended nearly $2,000,000 conducting these investigations and yet are unable to find any fraud practiced by anybody under the Democratic administration during the progress of this war. They sent an investigating committee on a junketing trip to Europe at the expense of many thousands of dollars. They sent another junketing committee in a private car to the Pacific coast at the expense of over $4,000. One of these committees, notwithstanding practically all of them were good lawyers, employed an attorney at the rate of $20,000 per year to assist them in their investigation. They employed experts of various kinds and paid them fabulous salaries, all of which came out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country; and yet nothing came out of this investigation except the playing of peanut politics.

This Republican Congress has been dominated absolutely by a steering committee of seven members, five of whom are millionaires and constitute a majority of this committee. The Cannon régime was repudiated by the people many years ago because it domineered the American Congress, but the Cannon régime was a Sunday-school convention compared with the domineering of this steering committee. Who are the members of this Republican steering committee? The chairman is the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL; Messrs. LONGWORTH, of Ohio; MADDEN, of Illinois; DUNN, of New York; WINSLOW, of Massachusetts; and DARROW, of Pennsylvania, the last five of whom are millionaires; and Speaker GILLETT, of Massachusetts. As I have said, a majority of this Republican steering committee are millionaires; therefore four or five millionaire Members of the House decide what legislation shall come before the House and what shall not. Not a one of these men on this committee represents an agricultural district. Not a one of them is in sympathy with the laboring class of the American people; therefore the great toiling masses of this country which produce its wealth in the sweat of their faces have no representative on this committee, and therefore have no representative who is consulted as to what legislation shall come before this Congress.

Ever since President Wilson brought the League of Nations and the treaty of peace—the greatest document, in my judgment, except the Constitution of the United States, that has ever been written—from the peace table at Paris to the Senate of the United States, Republican Members of the Senate have been doing everything they could to embarrass the President, to discredit his great administration, and to prevent the United States from joining the League of Nations, which is the only thing offered to prevent future wars. As a result of this, the world has been in a turmoil, all business unsettled and disturbed. The United States and China are the only leading nations of the earth that have not joined the League of Nations. Exchange of foreign countries has been declining in value by leaps and bounds. My opinion is that one of the greatest causes of the decline of the exchange of foreign countries is the failure of the United States Senate to ratify the League of Nations and treaty of peace. The evil result it has had upon the agricultural interests of this country can not be told.

I represent on the floor of this House a congressional district where a great amount of dark tobacco is raised, 80 per cent of which is export tobacco. Therefore the tobacco farmers of my district have to depend upon foreign markets for the price they get for this tobacco. The principal countries to which this tobacco goes are Italy, France, Germany, Austria, Spain, Norway, and Sweden. When the tobacco market opened in western Kentucky last December dark tobacco brought the highest price ever paid; but as soon as the exchange of Italy and France began to decline the Regie tobacco buyers withdrew from the market and the price of tobacco went down. Therefore the tobacco farmers in my district had no competitive market in which to sell their tobacco and have suffered a loss of millions of dollars by reason of the decline of the exchange of these countries, the decline of which, I believe, is due more to the failure of the Republican Senate to ratify the League of Nations and treaty of peace than anything else. An appeal from the tobacco farmers of my district came to me asking if something could not be done by Congress. I immediately went to the War Finance Corporation in an effort to get a loan for the Regie buyers with which to buy this tobacco. I was informed by the members of this board, and it is true, that under the law they had no power to loan money directly to a foreign Government for export purposes. I then introduced a bill to amend the War Finance Corporation act which would have permitted the members of the War Finance Corporation to loan money to foreign Governments which had and maintained a monopoly on its tobacco. This bill was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. I, with several of my colleagues, went before a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee and made a statement and appeal to them for the passage of this bill. After the hearing was conducted, this Republican Ways and Means Committee turned a deaf ear to our appeals and to my bill, and nothing was done. There was not a Republican on the Ways and Means Committee that represented a tobacco-growing district.

I believe that when the attention of the people of this great country is called to the contrast in the records made by the Democratic Congresses and this Republican Congress they will rise with their ballots at the November election and place a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress back in power. If this is done, all war-time legislation and the obnoxious features of the revenue law will be repealed, constructive legislation will be enacted, and we will again get down to a peace-time basis, which will bring prosperity to every citizen of this great Republic.

Mr. Speaker, I have never lost an opportunity since I have been a Member of Congress to render every service possible to the great people of my district who have so generously honored me. I have rendered every service possible in the making of laws that would promote the agricultural interests of my district and bring prosperity to those who till the soil. I believe that every laborer is worthy of his hire, whether he labors on the farm, in the mines, factory, or mill, and I have enthusiastically supported every measure that would bring about this result. I have tried to represent all the people and protect and help business in every way. It shall be my constant endeavor, so long as I am a Member of Congress, to render every service possible for the good of the great people whom I have the honor to represent.

Anarchy and Revolution by Direct Action—Sedition and Incitement to Sedition.

OF

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 10, 1920.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I opposed the increase beyond the sum authorized for the Department of Justice. I must now oppose this request to specify the amount to be spent for the Mexican border out of this lump sum appropriation. It would be to reduce the lump sum now available, $2,600,000, for the entire Immigration Service. That much is all you have for the enforcement of the immigration act. That pays the inspectors, all the employees, and if one wanted deportations of anarchists properly taken care of the place to add the money would be right here instead of additional sums as proposed a minute ago to the Department of Justice. The Department of Justice does not make its arrests in a way that is acceptable, apparently, to the Department of Labor, although the Department of Justice gets its warrants of arrest from the Department of Labor. The two departments are at outs, and quite naturally so. The reason is clear. This administration is radical at one end and conservative at the other. The result is confusion. Aliens held for deportation lie in jail while the heads of departments write letters to each other, pass memoranda back and forth, accuse each other, and split hairs over the meaning of the word "anarchist" as found in the law. Even the Solicitor for the Department of Labor, Mr. Abercrombie, a former Member of Congress, himself says that they have split hairs in that department on deportation cases until they have destroyed the effectiveness of the law.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spent about a month of the hardest work that any man could do in trying to clean up this department down here. After all, is it going to amount to something?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not just going to die off?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; we will be at it——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Ralston, the anarchist attorney, has not stopped it before the Committee on Rules?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not at all. Let me explain. I think you will find the public interested in just what is happening. They are finding out that under rulings of the Secretary of Labor membership by an alien in one revolutionary organization makes that alien deportable, while membership in another organization with identical purposes does not make him deportable. What is the result? Why, the revolutionary alien moves out of the proscribed organization into the protected organization and goes right on with his propaganda for the overthrow of government, the destruction of property, and revolution. They change their printed matter so that it runs exactly to the border line—the border line fixed by the decisions of the Secretary, Mr. Wilson, and the execution thereof by the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Post. They have ruined the office of the commissioner general. They have thrown out the rules, regulations, and recommendations of Mr. Caminetti. They denounce his system, and yet they use it when it suits their plans. Commissioner General Caminetti's position has been made almost unbearable. His earnest efforts to enforce the immigration laws have been blocked. His force of inspectors throughout the United States has been demoralized and their good work destroyed by a system of "rules of guidance" which will make future arrests practically futile until we can secure new laws and a change in the official heads.

Revolutionists and terrorists in the United States are taking notice. Even the Socialist Party joins in. It is in convention this week. It does not talk direct action, but it finds a way to get at it in this manner:

International socialism is to be gained by peaceful means, through the reinforcement of political action, and by industrial action.

Do you get it? Political action reinforced by industrial action. That is the way the polite and parlor element of the Socialist Party fixes it, so that they can let the members who want industrial action have that, while others may carry it up further and make it direct action, and still others carry it on further, and make it force and violence against the Government of the United States.

Oh, they deny and deny, but the fact remains that the simplest socialist and the wildest anarchist carry the same red flag and stand on the platform and principles of the Third Internationale.

While Morris Hillquit, leader of the socialists in New York—born in Riga, Russia—wants a soviet government here, he pleads for the freedom that comes under the soviet governemnt—as in Russia.

And while Hillquit pleads there comes the following message from Kiev, Russia:

Khrustaleff Nossar, chief organizer of the first Russian revolution and at one time closely identified with Lenin and Trotski, has been executed at Moscow by order of the soviet authorities. Nossar's offense was his authorship of a pamphlet entitled "How Trotski Sold Russia."

Do the radicals in America realize what kind of freedom of speech Lenin and Trotski are giving to the Russians?

According to decisions of Secretary of Labor Wilson, alien members of the I. W. W. and alien members of the Communist Labor Party are not deportable unless caught in overt acts of force and violence against this Government.

Secretary Wilson in his decision remarks that the Communist Labor Party wants its revolution by ballot. But the alien members do not vote. When they say ballot they mean bullets, and so do the rest of the revolutionists, no matter what party they belong to.

Mrs. Amy Collyer, a resident of Wellesley, Mass., but a citizen of England, held for deportation, made that clear in habeas corpus proceedings before Judge Anderson in the United States district court at Boston. She, a citizen of England, is here in the United States working night and day for a revolution. She says that whether it is to be a bloody revolution or not is a question of judgment. She says to the court:

We are living in a time when there is a frightful amount of force and violence in the world, and revolution has no terrors for me from that point of view.

But deportation from the United States strikes terror to the hearts of herself and her British husband. They resist deportation, and the pacifists fly to her aid. Mrs. Collyer says in her sworn testimony:

I certainly look to a revolution in the United States some day.

She says the Communist Party is committed to it. She says:

I think a bloody revolution is very often better than no revolution.

She testified further:

Q. From whom do you expect violence and bloodshed; do you expect that from the majority or from the minority?—A. From the minority.

Why, I ask you, should she not be returned to her home in England?

I urge the Senate to pass the alien-deportation bill which the House passed without a dissenting vote on December 20 last. That bill makes clear and plain the causes for which aliens who preach the overthrow of this Government may be deported. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under permission to extend my remarks, I desire to call attention to statements made by me before the House Judiciary Committee with regard to the sedition laws. I add extracts from that hearing as follows:

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1920.

The committee assembled at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Hon. ANDREW J. VOLSTEAD (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. JOHNSON, will you proceed with your statement?

STATEMENT OF HON. ALBERT JOHNSON, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I am much interested in the efforts being made in both House and Senate to find a true definition of sedition, to make way for the enactment of law for the punishment of sedition.

I am in hopes that this committee will bring forth a bill defining sedition clearly and sharply, and willful incitement to sedition, and then let the bill stop. I do not think it is necessary to add paragraphs mentioning the circulation of newspapers and the discussion of free speech, or the like of that, for the reason that the people of the United States generally know what is sedition. I think they realize the necessity for a more accurate definition than we have in the present law.

I think the people will accept a broad definition of incitement to sedition; so that if I, as a newspaper publisher, write and print articles inciting to armed revolution, or to force and violence, I will be easily reached under a bill that you will bring forth.

The CHAIRMAN. How about these organizations that advocate that sort of thing?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that the organizations which, to date, have rather openly preached violence will continue to do so secretly, if they can not do it openly, and always preaching up to the breaking point. That has been the trouble. But as it shall become more and more certain that aliens can not do that thing in the United States, we shall have less trouble with our native born and naturalized "force and violence" fellows, and with true sedition legislation on our statutes, they will soon find it desirable to keep within bounds.

Your question, Mr. Chairman, leads me to say that I have been interested for years in trying to find the dividing line in the whole socialistic array. In my mind I can see a socialistic ladder. The feet of the ladder rest on the Marxian doctrines and the sides are spliced with Bakuninism. In the mind of the socialist himself the ladder reaches to dizzy heights—to Utopia, where neither brain nor brawn count.

To start climbing this ladder you must first of all be an internationalist. And what classes do we find on the rungs of the ladder, attempting to climb to the heights of Elysium? On the first rung we find the plain, common socialist, a simple working man, actually believing that he will find in socialism some relief for himself and his brother workingman—and in his hand is the red flag.

On the next rung you will find probably a man just out of college, a recent graduate, with lots of ideas not well defined; he plays at socialism.

On the rung of the ladder above that you will find your parlor socialists, many of them seeking notoriety, and many others belonging to classes whose needs in this life have been filled through the activities of their parents, and they talk socialism without knowing how it will work below, on the ground, or higher.

On the next highest rung you may find the commercial socialist—ah, yes, there are such, who find that it pays to write socialist books and make socialist lectures. At last count one of those had written 101 books, and he is still in the prime of life.

And then on the next rung of the ladder you will find your I. W. W's actually preaching the destruction of property, sabotage, and things like that, and that is where your trouble begins.

And above those on the socialist ladder you will find the communist; and on the top rung of all you will find the anarchist, who is not a socialist at all, but who has in his hand the same red flag that the man on the first rung of the ladder has; and the poor fellow on the first rung never seems to realize that the dime or the dollar that he contributes goes to the support of some enemy of the Government on the top rung of the ladder.

Where is the line between the preaching of sedition and the discussion of political rights? It is almost invisible. Every man on that ladder wants a general strike; every man looks for, works for, the overthrow of the present social condition. But there is a line of demarcation. That line is where they begin to preach the overthrow of the Government by force, when they call for assassination, for arms, for physical effort, for the destruction of life and property, for the violation of criminal statutes. That is where sedition begins.

And I think, Mr. Chairman, that you will need a bill which, while it will not attempt to deny the right of publications to the use of the mails or abridge free speech or ban free assembly, will have in it a clause which will cover the willful incitement to sedition. Otherwise the law that you have might cover every purpose. * * *

Mr. Chairman, let me call attention to the fact that deportations are not made in the same way as convictions under this or any other criminal law. The public is inclined to confuse the two processes. Deportation does not imply punishment; it is not the result of a trial, except a mere hearing. Deportations are for the good of this Government, and are made according to hard and fast rules concerning the admission of an alien which he violates when he does certain things. For instance, an alien admits that he is an anarchist. The law says that anarchists shall be deported. Therefore it does not make any difference what kind of an anarchist he is—philosophical, Bakunin, or otherwise—he must be deported. But if he is a citizen he must commit the overt act.

In my opinion, when we make sure that we can deport from the United States every alien who comes here and tries to preach revolution and teach it, write it, advocate it, and at the same time make sure that no native-born or naturalized person in the United States shall preach actual sedition, without a pretty sure chance of his arrest and trial, the disturbances in the United States will quickly right themselves, because we will admit, of course, that up to a certain rung of the ladder which I have described all of these socialists are entitled to their views as political views. No matter how foolish those views may seem to many of us, they are entitled to them.

A man in Boston recently called upon those in his hearing for direct action and every kind of violence for the overthrow of the Government and the destruction of property. "Wipe out every evidence of the ownership of property," he said. "We get nowhere by moving politically; we must act. It may seem to you that we do not act with sufficient rapidity, and why do we not move faster? Because we are met by policemen and each policeman is armed. Each policeman with his revolver is equal to 15 or 20 of us, but the time will soon change when every one of us will be equal in force to that policeman." Thereupon this communist official proceeded to collect an assessment from his followers for the purchase of revolvers.

What happens to such a man if he is an alien? He is subject to deportation on his failure to prove that he did not make such a statement. But if he is a naturalized citizen (which he was) what can you charge him with? Can you prove sedition? Have you any law under which you can charge him with incitement to sedition? Even if those dupes only go so far with their revolvers as to await some strike in Boston, when they may loot and riot, shall we permit that same preachment? Can such a man stand on the right of free speech in the United States of America?

Now, if that man had advocated the burning of factories or the destruction of machinery he could have been prosecuted under the State antisabotage or criminal syndicalism law. But what law has the Nation to reach him and his crime?

Mr. IGOE. One of the contentions is that the passage of a law like this would do more harm than good, and I am trying to get at the effect of the Washington State law passed on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will be good provided you do not go too far. Make the law firm, but not repressive of any right. That is the appeal that I am trying to make. I think our law has been effective. I am very sure that the Oregon law has been effective. And I feel perfectly sure that the passage of a Federal law, just making a certain definition of sedition, and also the incitement to sedition, will be effective and that no one can deny that the United States should have such a law. Let the radicals turn into liberals and they will be glad we have such a law. Then they can print and talk and say anything they want to; advocate anything they wish, except sedition or actual incitement to sedition.

A Plain Talk to Congress By a Montana Farmer.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL W. RIDDICK,

OF MONTANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 31, 1920.

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker, letters I have received from every part of the country register the discontent that is becoming more and more prevalent among the people of all walks of life.

The complaints that reach me come alike from the business and professional men of our cities and towns, from the men and women who work for wages, and from the farmers, who, under present conditions, are finding it more and more impossible to produce the food and clothes that the Nation and the world must have. The complaint comes from the housewives who find prices soaring higher and higher and the purchasing price of the dollar becoming smaller and smaller. It comes from our patriotic people who saved and sacrificed to buy Liberty bonds to help win the war and who now find those bonds shrinking in value. If comes from the soldiers who neither hesitated nor complained at sacrifices which they were asked to make and who upon their return, after winning the war, find that the resources of the Nation have been wasted in an orgy of riotous spending never before dreamed of, in which profiteering was not only permitted but was aided and encouraged by the unbusinesslike policies of the Wilson administration, which created more millionaires during the short war period than were made during the whole preceding life of the Nation.

DISCONTENT NATION WIDE AND TOUCHES ALL CLASSES OF PEOPLE.

This nation-wide discontent, the increase of radicalism and even socialism, the strikes and threats of violence, the uniting of hundreds of thousands of farmers of great Western States into organizations for self-protection and redress, are unmistakable evidences of dissatisfaction that exists the Nation over, dissatisfaction with governmental affairs as conducted under the autocratic policies of Woodrow Wilson and his Democratic administration.

WILSON AUTOCRACY HAS AROUSED REBELLIOUS SPIRIT.

Things do not just happen in this world. There is a cause for the high cost of living. There is a cause for the decreased production and general shortage of things we need. There is a reason for the general demoralized condition of affairs in the Nation. There is a reason for the radical expressions from producers in city and country and the organized expressions of unrest. I charge that President Wilson and his Democratic administration are directly responsible for these evils, and my observation is that the people of the Nation well recognize that fact, and will repudiate him and his autocracy and willfulness and false promises and unsound theories when they vote at the coming election.

Nearly eight years ago President Wilson and his party came into complete control of the executive and legislative branches of Government on the claim that the country was in the hands of plutocrats and profiteers. They said that by laws curbing monopoly and introducing the "new freedom" and by bringing the Government to that "simplicity and economy befitting a democratic government" they would lift the burden of high living costs and high governmental cost from the backs of the American people.

That was the beginning of an administration of false promises.

During the first year of complete control of the country conditions went from good to bad. After a year and a half hundreds of thousands of men were out of work, prices for farm products had dropped, and the Nation was rapidly facing a panic. Then came the World War that temporarily saved the situation in this country.

Then followed an era of more camouflage and false promises that cost this Nation, in the blood and lives of our sons and in money treasure, more than can ever be estimated. The unpreparedness with which we entered the war was the sole fault of the President.

During the early period of the war the President declared to the world that the American people were too proud to fight, and that the causes of the war were no concern to us, that he was unable to discern any difference between the purposes of the two sets of belligerents, that it was our duty to be neutral even in our thoughts, and that we might hope to have peace without victory, and that America must lead her own life and keep clear of European entanglements.

When Members of Congress suggested the need of making some preparation for a war that was known to be inevitable by those upon the inside of governmental affairs he denounced such suggestions as needless excitability and hysteria.

He sought reelection on this record that he kept us out of war, and after election he went before Congress and recommended that we should enter the war.

ALL OUR PEOPLE UNITEDLY PLACED FULL CONFIDENCE IN WILSON.

Congress and the people gave to the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy all the resources of the Nation and the authority of a dictator, that the war might be prosecuted to the best advantage. Men, money, and credit were furnished without stint. The picture of the President was engraved on a poster with that of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, and these were scattered broadcast over the land. No criticism was permitted to be whispered, while a patriotic and united people volunteered every aid and sacrifice that could be suggested.

HOW THE PEOPLE'S CONFIDENCE WAS REWARDED.

From the beginning of the war the President's attitude toward Republicans showed his desire to make it a Democratic Party war. He refused to use the services of men of ability unless they belonged to his political family. He used the great war agencies created for the good of the Nation for the perpetuation of Democrats in office.

During the entire period of the war inefficiency, incompetency, extravagance, waste, and fraud of the grossest kind were perpetrated upon the American people by those in places of authority.

When the tide of battle was turned in our favor, and it was in our power to completely rout the enemy and march on to Berlin and make our victory complete, the President interfered and the army of the enemy was permitted to march home with colors flying and in an arrogant and haughty spirit.

HE KEEPS US OUT OF PEACE.

When the armistice was signed and peace was about to be entered into he boastfully announced that he had so intertwined the peace treaty with his fanciful and un-American League of Nations scheme that we could not have the one unless we also took the other. For a year and a half he has insisted that we enter a world league that will obligate us to mix into every European quarrel, that will compel us to keep a standing Army of American boys in Europe for years, and cost the already overburdened taxpayers of America millions of dollars a year. Furthermore it would give a group of foreign nations, which are jealous of our prosperity and unsympathetic with our ideals, an active hand in controlling our own affairs and our future destiny.

Fortunately the people refused the President's impudent and partisan demand for a Democratic Congress and elected a Republican House and Senate that have steadfastly refused to yield one iota of our independence or sovereignity to European nations. This Republican Congress has also refused to accept a mandate over Armenia, which would mean the maintaining of an American army there for years at great cost, and the certainty that we would sooner or later be involved in European rows.

When this Republican Congress voted for peace with Germany, and to end the war powers of the President, and to reduce the immense force of war workers still maintained at the National Capital, and to make it possible to resume trade relations with Germany, as has already been done by our allies, the President vetoed the measure, to keep us technically in war, and thus managed to perpetuate his autocratic war-time authority in time of actual peace.

ABOMINABLE COST-PLUS CONTRACTS ENCOURAGED PROFITEERING.

The President and his War Department are directly responsible for the great waste and frauds and excessive expenditures and subsequent high prices that were the natural result of the abominable cost-plus system. Contrary to existing law, no bids were received. Favored contractors were advanced large sums of money, collected from the people's savings, and given 10 per cent or more profit on the cost of the work. A job that would ordinarily cost $1,000,000 was made to cost $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, so that the contractor's profit would be $300,000 or $400,000 instead of $100,000. Material was purposely purchased at the highest price possible and was purposely wasted. Work hours were reduced and holidays increased. Laborers were ordered to reduce their efforts so as to make room for more men so as to increase the cost of the job so the contractor's 10 per cent profit would mount to a higher figure. Pay rolls were even padded. Teams were employed and then held in idleness day after day to increase costs and add to the profits of the profiteering contractors, while little children were asked to go without candy and gum to save their pennies for war stamps and baby bonds.

RADICAL LABOR AGITATORS CODDLED AND ENCOURAGED.

While farmers were voluntarily increasing their hours of labor as a patriotic duty and workmen were speeding up production radical labor disturbers were coddled and agitators were encouraged by President Wilson to promote their brand of unionism, not for justice and fair-dealing among workmen, but that the overgreedy might share in the orgy of idleness and waste that became a regular part of the administration's policy. When every man should have been doing his utmost, we had the spectacle of the police force of a great city going on strike and permitting robbery and loot without hindrance. We saw highly paid men, receiving $8 to $14 a day, go on strike over little grievances and deliberately quit work in order to enforce their arrogant and unreasonable demands, regardless of the fact that by their idleness and refusal to produce they were aiding the Kaiser and his army and jeopardizing the safety and lives of our own soldier boys.

Millions of dollars' worth of materials were purchased and paid for after the armistice for which there was no earthly need.

ADMINISTRATION OPPOSED BONUS FOR SOLDIERS.

After the armistice thousands of business men rushed to Washington and collected immense claims for materials and services never furnished, and for cancellation of contracts in many cases where no expense or loss had been entailed. These same business men, who had made immense profits without sacrifice of comfort or limbs and without facing the steel and bullets of the enemy, were the first to protest when it was proposed to give a compensating bonus to ex-service men who had rendered hazardous service in the Army at about a dollar a day. The total amount paid these business men to satisfy cancellation of contracts alone exceeds in amount the sum proposed to be raised for soldier bonus purposes. With the same facility with which they secured the fat war contracts and juicy settlements this same crowd secured the ear of the administration, which, through a Cabinet member, the Secretary of the Treasury, officially announced that a bonus is impossible of consideration at this time and would ruin the country.

GAVE FAT BONUSES TO ITS FAVORED FRIENDS.

But while jealous of its dollars for ex-service men let us see how this administration expended millions among its favored friends.

The War Department contracted with a Hammond, Ind., steel car company to construct 964 howitzer carriages. It agreed to pay for the cost of buildings, material, and machinery, and the company was to be paid a commission upon the total cost of the carriages. The Government paid for the buildings which were erected upon the company's grounds $2,987,200, and after the armistice was signed the War Department sold these buildings back to the company for $600,000. At the time the armistice was signed this company had on hand material for which the Government had paid $5,558,000, and the administration sold this material back to the company as junk for the sum of $300,000, and that, too, in the face of the fact arsenals of the United States were clamoring for material of this same character. Not a single howitzer carriage had been delivered to the Government prior to the signing of the armistice, but after the armistice was signed the Ordnance Department had the company finish 200 of these carriages, and these 200 carriages cost the Government the sum of $18,582,428.88, which sum representatives of this administration paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

At the date of the armistice we had 3,700,000 men under arms, while we had more than 100,000,000 people engaged in civil life. To have filled the orders made by the War Department for leather goods for use in the Army would have required 300,000 more than all the hides produced in the United States.

The War Department had in the Army 391,000 horses and mules, and yet there were purchased for use upon these horses and mules 945,000 saddles and over 1,000,000 sets of double harness, which was enough to cover more than 2,000,000 horses at one time.

PURCHASED FOUR BRUSHES AND SEVEN HALTERS FOR EVERY HORSE.

The War Department purchased 1,637,197 horse brushes, 2,029,418 nose feedbags, 1,148,346 horse covers, 2,850,853 halters, and all of this equipment to be used on 391,000 horses. It is difficult to comprehend, in the face of these facts, how officials of the administration in power expected 100,000,000 people in civil life to procure the necessary leather for shoes.

The War Department decided its 391,000 horses and mules must be branded. A representative of the War Department entered into a contract for 195,000 branding irons. This was one branding iron for every two horses in the Army. The contract required that these irons should be made of copper, which was both scarce and expensive. The contractor purchased 79,952 pounds of copper, which was 20,000 pounds more than needed to make irons, and officials of the company stated that they paid 39½ cents per pound therefor. The War Department paid 39½ cents per pound for all this copper and then immediately sold it back to the company for 11 cents per pound. We won the war without branding the horses and mules, because no branding irons had been delivered at the time the armistice was signed. But the records of the War Department show that officials of this administration compromised the claim of this company by paying them $40,000.

SOLD SUGAR AT 2 CENTS A POUND TO PROTECT PROFITS OF FRIENDS.

During the summer and fall of the last year the supply of sugar in this country was so short that sugar was selling for 20 cents per pound, and during the same period the War Department sold 22,000,000 pounds of sugar in France at 2 cents per pound so the Sugar Trust could easier squeeze the American public.

When the armistice was signed our Government had in France foodstuffs, clothing, textiles, automobiles, and other supplies of an approximate value of $2,000,000,000. This administration sold that enormous quantity of supplies for $400,000,000, or 20 per cent of its real value, on long-term payments, in order to keep prices high and protect the profit of favored friends in this country.

All these and other facts I give here are well substantiated by testimony before congressional committees and are not denied.

MILLIONS SPENT IN SOUTH TO NO PURPOSE.

This administration spent $150,000,000 building port terminals at Charleston, Norfolk, and other places from which not a single ship sailed during the war.

This administration spent $20,000,000 building a terminal up the river from Charleston, which ships could not reach because the river was too shallow to float them.

This administration spent $120,000,000 building nitrate plants, but did not produce a pound of the powder used in the war.

This administration spent $100,000,000 on tanks, but the first American tank reached France after the armistice.

This administration spent $1,000,000,000 on shells, but only 17,000 American-made shells reached our forces in France—about 10 minutes' supply.

This administration spent $117,000,000 on gas, but not a single American-made gas shell was fired by the American forces in France.

This administration spent $478,000,000 on guns, but only 72 American-made guns reached our forces at the front.

This administration spent $70,000,000 on a powder plant at Nitro, W. Va., and sold it for eight million.

This administration spent $7,000,000 on a naval training camp in Virginia after the armistice was signed.

In the 19 months after fighting stopped the Democratic administration spent more money than was spent during the 19 months of actual warfare.

SWIVEL CHAIR PATRIOTISM ENCOURAGED.

When the war was in full blast the United States Government had in the Army and Navy establishments alone over 750,000 persons drawing salaries in bullet-proof jobs. This was more than the entire fighting force on the French line at any one time. It was a larger force than the total number of American soldiers which actually got in the fight in France. Never was there such an orgy of extravagance, such reckless spending of the people's money. Tons of nails hauled to dumps. Teams kept on pay rolls, but hidden away in gravel pits to make it appear they were being used. Gangs of workmen almost constantly gambling, shooting craps, idling their time away, and protected in all this by "radical union organizers" who boasted their pull then, and now are defending the administration and condemning the Republican Congress that separated them from their Government jobs. More than $12,500,000 feet of finished lumber and untied flooring burned and wasted. Total cost, $1,200,000,000; lost through waste and extravagance, $600,000,000. These are newly found facts, just come to light. Attorney General Palmer is asked to stop prosecuting farmers long enough to file suits against some of these guilty parties.

Before the war Secretary Baker truthfully said that the American Army engineer was the best in the world. During the war he used them as clerks. Civilian contractors, and in many instances subcontractors, were paid $50,000 a month for merely supervising the construction of camps and cantonments, for which these badly paid distinguished experts on the public pay roll were available by the score.

USING PUBLIC FUNDS FOR PARTISAN PUBLICITY.

Two hundred and sixty-six bureaus have been found that have been doing press-agent work for the present Democratic administration at a cost to the people of $2,500,000 a year, and thus have the people been taxed to poison their minds with partisan propaganda. The typical administration press agents worked on the theory that they should exploit everything favorable and suppress everything unfavorable to the administration. They are always ready with the mimeograph and reams of paper as their weapon to defend the administration against any and all criticisms and unfavorable comments. They exploit the accomplishments of administration officials and carefully suppress details that are not to their credit, and use tons of paper daily, adding to Government expenses, increasing the paper shortage, adding to the congestion of the mails, and deceiving the people as to the actual conditions.

DELIBERATELY KEEPING PRICES HIGH.

On the theory that the war would last three years longer than it did, the War Department accumulated a vast supply of material, but, despite the fact that a division of sales was created shortly after the signing of the armistice, Secretary Baker, for some reason, has sold part of the material at a big loss and held more than $1,000,000,000 worth that could be sold at a profit. The supplies held under his "reservation orders" are not of use to the Government and become less serviceable with time and weather. Holding them is a drain on the Treasury. The more important include from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000 worth of machine tools of standard makes, a large part of which are lying useless in open storage. With the demand for increased production, these tools would go a long way toward meeting the needs of the industries of the country. Eight hundred thousand kegs of nails bought by the Government at a price averaging $3 a keg; the market price to-day is $6.50 a keg, and the demand can not be met. Sixty million feet of lumber, enough to build three cantonments the size of the present National Army camps; all this lumber was bought at a price far lower than that prevailing to-day. Approximately 100,000 desks equipped with typewriters, adding machines, or other mechanical devices used up to the signing of the armistice.

FAVORED DRAFT EVADERS.

In addition to the waste of money is the scandal of the present administration in dealing with draft evaders, culminating with the opportunity to escape made for Bergdoll, the wealthy draft evader of Pennsylvania.

Now that the war is over the favoritism shown the South is becoming better understood. In my State of Montana the population for purposes of the draft was estimated unreasonably high, so as to compel Montana to furnish more than her fair share of boys for the draft. As our State was discriminated against, Southern States were favored.

WESTERN FARMERS DELIBERATELY DISCRIMINATED AGAINST.

When the price of wheat was fixed the Southern States that harvested early were permitted to first sell their crop at around $3 per bushel, and the same year Montana's crop, harvested later, was sacrificed at less than $2 per bushel through the autocratic war power of the administration.

Despite these and similar discriminations, we Montana farmers increased our hours and increased our acreages. The State of Montana went over the top in all the war drives, while many Southern States were slackers.

War Department records place Montana troops at the top of all the States for valor, they having lost a larger proportion of men in action than the boys from any sister State.

And how have we been rewarded for that loyalty and sacrifice and valor?

The price of our staple crop was fixed at a price far below its actual value, while prices were permitted to soar without limit on everything that entered into wheat production and everything the farmer had to buy. The staple crops of the South and other sections were permitted to range as high as they would go. Montana farmers were compelled to contribute millions of dollars in the way of cheap wheat to European nations and to highly paid war workers in the cities.

After the war, when European nations endeavored to buy our wheat at a premium over the Government-fixed price, this administration, consistent with its unfriendly attitude toward the farmers of the Northwest, actually put an embargo upon the export of our wheat and denied us this foreign market for the avowed purpose of holding down the price of our wheat.

At the same time it was using its arbitrary war powers to penalize the western wheat farmer, it was using the same autocratic war authority and the people's money to extend foreign markets for the cotton grower of the South, and meat packers, and the canning trusts, and the automobile and the shoe manufacturers of the cities, so as to increase the profit of these favored friends.

RADICALISM IS NATURAL RESULT OF AUTOCRATIC MISUSE OF WAR POWERS.

I charge that the cost-plus system, the waste, the fraud, the extravagance, the favoritism, the hoarding, the cornering of markets, all deliberately made a part of the policy of the present Democratic administration, are alone responsible for the excessive high prices and for the shortage of things we need, for the low value of the dollar, for the depreciation of Liberty bonds, for the demoralized condition of the country, and for the unnecessarily large debt which will burden taxpayers for years before it can finally be wiped out, and for the socialism and radicalism which is a national expression of the anger of the people over the repeated gross injustices that have been perpetrated upon them by the Wilson policies of the past seven years.

I am not surprised that 40,000 farmers of my State have organized in protest over these injustices. I am only surprised that they have been so patient and so temperate as they have. I am surprised that they are not more bitter than they are in their thought and in their utterances, as many of them have lost their life-time savings, while earnestly attempting to serve their country's need, while the administration has been pouring millions in unearned profits into the laps of favored friends, as disclosed by records that no one denies.

DEMOCRATIC "PAY-TRIOTEERS" DENOUNCE FARMERS.

We have a spectacle in the State of Montana so strange as to be worth mentioning. Two Democratic editors, by name Jeffy Johns and Bill Campbell, have young men of fighting age in their families who never found their way into the service. These gentlemen, throughout the war and since, have published column after column in their papers to the effect that the 40,000 or more organized farmers in Montana are lacking in patriotism and loyalty, and they have held the greater part of the farm population of that State as being Bolshevists and lacking in intelligence and integrity.

It was the sons of these farmers and many of these young farmers themselves who made up the major part of the Montana troops whose record exceeds all others for valor in battle. While these brave boys were fighting for America, these and other Democratic editors of my State have confined their fighting to a defense of President Wilson and his administration in all its unfairness and extravagance and inefficiency and favoritism and to gas attacks upon the name and honor and loyalty and intelligence of almost the entire farm population of the third largest State in the Union. One of these editors, Bill Campbell, organized a Loyalty League and raised thousands of dollars from business men, which was all used in antagonizing and taunting these farmers except the several thousand dollars which Mr. Campbell kept for his patriotic services, and which he has consistently invested in Canadian bonds because they pay a better profit than the Liberty bonds in which Montana farmers invested to help win the war.

FARMERS WILL SETTLE THEIR OWN TROUBLES.

Recent school statistics of the Nation show that Montana has the best educational system of any State in the Nation. The loyalty and fervid patriotism, the liberality and high character, of Montana people have always assayed 100 per cent pure at every test. Foolhardy, indeed, is the one who will impeach the intelligence and patriotism and Americanism of practically the whole farm population of a State like Montana. If the people are out of fix, and they are, they have sufficient reason, for they are a patient people. That they know where the blame rests, I am very sure. And when the Montana votes are counted in November it will be seen that these farmers will cast a solid vote of protest against the administration which has been largely responsible for their temporary undoing.

There is not the slightest danger that the farmers are turning to socialism. They believe too strongly in Americanism. They are now, as they ever have been, the bulwark of the Nation. They are grounded in the principles for which they and their sons and their fathers have fought at every crisis in the Nation's history, while the Bill Campbells and Jeffy Johns have remained at home and joined the chorus of the profiteers in bellowing about their own patriotism.

There is no danger that the farmers of America will turn to dark and bloody and ignorant Russia for plans for relief from the straits in which the present Democratic administration has plunged them.

CONSTRUCTIVE LEADERSHIP NEEDED.

But there are most serious farm problems that must have the thoughtful attention of our best statesmen, and I am glad that Republican leadership in the House and in the Senate is giving careful thought to these far-reaching problems, for a Republican President and a Republican Congress are the hope of the farmers of the Nation in the sound and sensible and permanent solution of far-reaching farm problems.

The Nation to-day needs more food and more clothes. Every morning 110,000,000 people in the United States wake up hungry. But one-third of the people are producers of food. These must not only produce the food they themselves consume, but must produce food for the other two-thirds of the population. To supply this need is not alone the farmers' problem. It is a problem for everyone to consider. The present tendency is rapidly toward a food shortage that will startle the world.

SOME SERIOUS FARM PROBLEMS.

The farm population is not keeping pace with the increase in the city population. Farm tenantry is increasing at an alarming rate. Consumption is rapidly overtaking production. The shortening of hours and the increasing of wages in the cities have drawn labor from the farm until the shortage is most alarming. At a time when the surplus of food and clothes is low, farmers are decreasing their acreage, not as a protest against existing conditions but through actual necessity.

Where labor can be had it is at a price so costly that the product oftentimes will not pay the wages.

The farmers of the country will continue to produce all they can. In time of peace no one is under obligation to produce at a loss. The farmer who produces at a loss will sooner or later go broke. Prudent farmers, of necessity, are reducing their acreage to a basis where they can plant and harvest their crops, chiefly by their own labor, and without running the risk of loss through inability to get help or the need of meeting the city schedule of high prices and short hours.

NO SIX-HOUR DAYS DEMANDED FOR FARMERS.

Farmers are not reducing the hours of their labor. They have never gone on strike. The eight-hour day and half holiday on Saturdays are the accepted rule in many labor centers. While radical labor-union leaders are demanding increased pay and in many cases a six-hour day and are often advocating the lessening of the output per hour and a general slackening in production, on the wrong theory that this will increase the demand for laborers and help the workers, our farmers are increasing their hours of labor and are even working Sundays and holidays in their earnest struggle to make their farming operations sufficiently profitable so they will not be compelled to suspend and go to the city for a living wage.

My Democratic colleague and good friend from New York says he objects to the big profits we farmers are making. My friend is undoubtedly honest and sincere in his belief that farmers are receiving too high prices for their products and are making too much money. It is just this misconception regarding farm operations and farm profits, in which my colleague from New York City is not alone, but which obtains among town dwellers too generally, that is, in part, responsible for the present condition, and which if persisted in will lead to an actual famine and increasing higher prices for food and clothing.

Statistics extending over a long period of years in this and in other countries emphasize the small income of the average farmer. There is scarcely any other interest in the world which has not brought forth large fortunes for some of the most energetic in its ranks. But no farmers grow rich from farming.

NATION FACING FOOD FAMINE.

A few years ago one would have regarded it as a far stretch of the imagination to suggest a situation where a housewife with ample funds could not purchase sufficient sugar for the home needs because there was no sugar to be had. I predict the time will come and is not far distant in this country, unless we forthwith correct existing conditions, when there will be the same condition as regards potatoes, meat, flour, and other staple foodstuffs. Production will continue to decrease until there is not enough to go around, and some of us will of necessity have to go without. Those who do not go hungry will pay dearly for their purchases.

How to correct this situation is a big and a complex question. It can not be met by resorting to socialism nor by denouncing big business nor through idle and undependable promises of theorists.

The average man of intelligence would hesitate about giving advice as to how to crown a tooth. He would feel that that was a technical subject to be approached only by experts who had both knowledge and experience. But, strange spectacle, let any half-baked theorist advocate a quack remedy to correct farm conditions and immediately he has a great audience and a following of intelligent men.

NEED CONSTRUCTIVE IDEALS, NOT RADICAL IDEALISTS.

What is really needed are the services of the best statesmen, the biggest business men, the best organizers—men who are recognized for their experience and qualities of justice and integrity in all their dealings—to solve the production problem.

The farm home must be made as comfortable as the town home. Opportunity for comforts and pleasures and education and travel must be made as available for those who live in the country as for those who live in towns. This will not be accomplished by theoretical or artificial means nor by resorting to socialism, but only by paying for farm production on a basis that will enable the farmer to compete with the city man in a financial way.

Markets must be stabilized.

The middleman and distributor are as necessary as the producer, but speculation that destroys competition and creates a false condition of supply and demand, and which seeks to create an unduly low market for the producer and an unreasonably high market for the consumer, must be stopped. Useless middlemen must be eliminated.

It must be made more profitable to produce than to juggle prices for individual profits.

Highways must be improved and transportation and marketing facilities bettered in many ways. These and other changes will have to be made before our farm population can properly meet the responsibility of production sufficient for the world's needs at reasonable prices.

FARMERS HAVE NOT BEEN PROFITEERS.

The charge that farmers have been profiteering during the war period is without foundation. In some States, especially in the South, the farmers have received better prices for their products than in former years. But this increase has largely been absorbed in increased costs and in paying off of debts and in loss of soil fertility, due to unusual efforts to produce. Any additional profits were used to build modern homes and in improving schools and churches and in doing other things which were new for the farmers, but which their city neighbors have been enjoying for many years.

OUR HOPE IS IN REPUBLICAN VICTORY.

I am glad that in view of the unfriendly attitude of the Democratic Party toward the farmer and the Northwest there is a place that we can go for relief. The Republican Party has shown itself our real and our consistent friend. While it is easy for me to understand the rebellious attitude of my fellow farmers in view of the injustices deliberately heaped upon us by the vicious misuse of governmental authority, and I can understand why new organizations of protest have sprung up during this era of Democratic mismanagement, it seems to me that our path in the future and our public duty lie very plainly before us. Our voice of protest has been sounded and the country has heard. The injustices that provoke us are recognized by Republican leaders as evils that must be corrected. The Republican Party promises to correct them. The time has now arrived not for further protest but for united and constructive effort with our friends to apply the remedy. The Nation is in revolt over Democratic inefficiency and favoritism. In the interest of the producers and in the interest of all of the people of the Nation a Republican President and a Republican Senate and a Republican House of Representatives will be elected in November. Republican leaders have solemnly pledged themselves to cooperate with the producers of the Nation to correct outstanding injustices and wrongs. The farmers and the workmen in the towns owe it to themselves in November to accept these pledges at their face value and to make the success of the Republican presidential and congressional ticket so tremendous and their part in the repudiation of the Wilson Democratic régime and victory for their Republican friends so evident that the very character of the result shall emphasize the Nation's desire for prompt action along lines of sound policy and public economy and at the hands of a political party that has met other great national problems in the past and set the Nation's feet on firm ground and its face turned in the direction of square dealing.

Sound political principles and laws are like natural laws and truth—always the same. The Republican Party, which is made up in its leadership, as in the past, of just and farsighted and dependable men who have recognized and adhered to sound policies, should be placed in charge of public affairs and given opportunity to correct the wrongs which have overtaken us. Such men will not grapple in vain with this situation, but will propose and help put into effect sound policies which will correct or reduce the evils which are about to overtake us.

These problems are commonly regarded as belonging to the farmer, but they are of even more importance to the manufacturer and the business man. The farmers could raise enough for themselves and their families and live for a few years without buying much from other people. But the rest of the world can not live unless our farmers produce the necessary food and clothing.

ABRAHAM ADAMS'S LETTERS ON LIVE TOPICS.

The following letters, received by me, signed Abraham Adams, are so filled with quaint expressions touching simple truths and fundamental principles of government affecting food supply, waste, production, distribution, and other matters of vital interest to the farmers and others that I commend them to the thoughtful consideration of every man who would have a better understanding of the issues and problems before us for solution:

A HINT AS TO GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

FELLOW CITIZEN: During the World War the United States purchased an aggregate of about 400,000 horses, but probably never had more than 300,000 at any one time. A part of these horses were for Cavalry, a part for Artillery, and a part for ambulance and supply work. Nevertheless the Government purchased for these horses over 2,500,000 harness (more than eight for each horse), 945,000 saddles (more than three for each horse), 2,550,000 leather halters (more than seven for each horse), 30 shoes for each horse, saddlebags, brushes, etc., in like abandon. In addition to all this, when the armistice was signed the War Department had on hand over 900 tons of black harness leather that cost the Government $1,600,000.

After the armistice the Government purchased and paid for 70,000 additional automobiles and trucks, and on the same ships that brought our boys home, sent 39,000 of them to Europe and sold them over there at one-fifth of what they had cost and took its pay in 10-year bonds worth somewhat over fifty cents on the dollar. This does not include the large number of trucks and automobiles purchased before the armistice, many thousands of which were never uncrated, but left to rot and rust, a part on this side and a part on the other side of the Atlantic.

It is not my purpose, in this or other letters, to criticize your Government and mine, or to find fault with the Democratic Party. The administration answers its critics with arguments of justification or with statements to the effect that any other party would have done as badly. Do you think any party could have done worse?

Query: What lessons do you think the American people should learn from our war experiences? Many think even its enormous cost not too high a price to pay for the great lesson that a Republic like ours can not conduct any business, whether it be railway transportation, shipbuilding, aeroplane construction, nitrate plants, armor-plate factories, or anything else, either economically or efficiently.

If you think the party in power largely to blame for the admitted extravagances, reckless waste, and blind contracts, how do you expect to insure the future against similar incompetency? Are you ready to get back as soon as possible to the principles and policies which this Government successfully pursued for more than 100 years, when it granted liberty and afforded protection to the citizen, while the citizen efficiently developed the resources of the country and made us the envy of the world? Are you prepared to take the Government out of business? Or do you intend to plunge her deeper and deeper into business? Have you learned the one great lesson of the war?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

DO YOU APPROVE OF THIS SAVING?

FELLOW CITIZEN: Thirty-five years ago John Sherman said, "The way to resume is to resume." The present Congress has demonstrated that the way to economize is to economize. That you may the better understand what the present Congress has done, I ask you to note the saving in but 2 of the 13 regular appropriation bills:

Over $1,000,000,000 were asked for the sundry civil bill, which includes appropriations for very many governmental functions, and less than $500,000,000 were allowed. Somewhat over $119,000,000 were asked, all told, by the administration in the fortification bill, and less than $18,000,000 were appropriated. The saving in these two bills aggregates in round numbers $700,000,000.

These savings were not at the expense of our soldiers and sailors of the World War or of previous wars. The sundry civil bill, as passed, carried a little over $300,000,000 for pensions, vocational training, compensation, insurance, and for returning the bodies of deceased soldiers and sailors.

You probably already know that no department, bureau, division, or commission thinks it has done its duty until it has expended every dollar that Congress has placed at its disposal. The committee on fortification not only saved $100,000,000 from what the administration had asked but it also covered back into the Treasury over $800,000,000 of unexpended appropriations, thereby preventing further waste. Then to the surprise of everyone and to the disgust of some, the Director of War Finance, the Chief of Coast Artillery, and a representative of the Ordnance Department went to the Capitol, and, in the name of the War Department, thanked the Republican chairman of the fortification committee for passing such a good and satisfactory bill. Yes; they did. The sum asked had been cut over $100,000,000, and the same bill had covered $800,000,000 back into the Treasury. All they seemed to need was some one to show them what they needed, and this committee proved able to supply "the long-felt want." This committee did for the War Department the work which the law presumes the various bureaus, divisions, and commissions shall do for themselves.

Query: Are you a taxpayer? If you are, I will not insult by asking whether you favor retrenchments. If you are a tax consumer, as distinguished from a taxpayer, I will venture the question whether, from purely a selfish viewpoint, you think it either a wise thing or a prudent thing for the Government to expend money for no better purpose than taking it away from the great mass of taxpayers and distributing it to a much smaller number of tax consumers?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

DO YOU BELIEVE IN MAJORITY RULE?

FELLOW CITIZEN: For the first time in our history the American people are confronted with the clean-cut issue whether an organized minority shall dictate to an unorganized majority. The American Federation of Labor has formulated its political demands, and boastfully decrees death to every Congressman, Senator, and candidate who refuses to swear allegiance exclusively to organized labor, thereby renouncing all allegiance to every other laborer and every other interest.

Stripped of platitudes these demands of organized labor include exemption from all antitrust laws, the right to choose their own representatives from within or without the plant, the expressly legalized right to strike either for a grievance or without one, exemption from injunctions compelling obedience to signed contracts, the payment of wages sufficient to render old age and retirement pensions unnecessary—absolutely impossible—and the prohibition of welfare and uplift work by employers of labor.

In effect 4,000,000 organized laborers, an insignificant fraction of the aggregate number of laborers, demand the legalized rights to close every coal mine, shut every factory, and stop every railroad train whenever a half dozen or more labor leaders and agitators—some of them openly revolutionary—can secure a following among the relatively defenseless membership. If this be not equivalent to asking the legalized right for 4,000,000 organized men to starve and freeze into subjection 100,000,000 hitherto supposedly liberty-loving Americans, it is time for them to explain what it does mean.

Their excuse, stripped of all verbiage, is that they dare not trust the intelligence, the justice, and the good sense of the rest of the American people. They refuse to trust commissions on which they have representatives. They refuse to trust the courts, because occasionally courts apply to organized laborers laws applicable to everybody else and require that signed contracts shall be fulfilled. An editorial in the Washington Times quotes the president of the American Federation of Labor, who professes to be conservative, with saying, "They do not intend any longer to have the governing power exercised by judges on the bench." If this be not an averment that labor unions, unlike unions of capital—sometimes called corporations—or unions of other citizens for other purposes shall have an existence above and superior to the law and be in and of themselves supreme, it is impossible to make such a claim.

Query: If you were compelled to have one or the other, which would you prefer, "invisible government" by men who want conditions of universal prosperity or visible government, such as the American Federation of Labor, now for the first time in the open, demands?

The American people shook themselves loose from the grip of "invisible government." Are they now able to escape the "strangle hold" of visible government?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

A TARIFF SUGGESTION.

FELLOW CITIZEN: The two great political parties radically and conscientiously differ on the question of tariffs. Both parties believe in levying duties upon imports. They differ only as to the nature of imports on which tariff duties shall be levied, and the purpose for which they shall be imposed. No party, and no country, admits all products from other countries free of tariff duties.

The Democratic Party levies tariff duties for revenue only. The Republican Party levies duties primarily for the purpose of giving Americans an advantage in American markets, and then imposes revenue duties on luxuries consumed by the wealthy and well to do.

The present tariff law, the Underwood bill, was not designed to afford any protection whatever. Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, who had charge of the bill in the Senate, in answer to inquiries made by Senator MCLEAN, of Connecticut, said: "We have not been trying to balance the difference of labor costs here and abroad because we were not trying to make a protective bill." A further inquiry evoked this answer:

"I have stated to the Senator that we were not trying to give protection in the duties on imports."

The Democratic intent that the bill should not protect was fully realized. It did not protect. It invited imports of every kind and character. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the first year of the Underwood tariff law, $375,000,000 more in agricultural products alone—all free of duty except a few that competed with southern planters—were imported than the average of the preceding four years of Republican administration. Before war orders revived industrial conditions, increased importations had thrown more than 4,000,000 men out of employment, thereby reducing the consumptive capacity of that many families.

The issue between the two great parties on the question of tariff is not one of good or evil intent. Both parties are sincere. Good men, educated men, rich men, and poor men can be found on each side of the issue. Where do you stand? President Wilson said at Baltimore, on September 25, 1916, "I want to see America pitted against the world, not in selfishness but in brains." That is internationalism with a vengeance. Republicans believe in giving Americans in the markets of America a selfish advantage over everyone else on earth. That is nationalism with a vengeance. Are you an internationalist or a nationalist?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

HERE IS A QUESTION THAT STRIKES HOME.

FELLOW CITIZEN: A popular belief exists that the tariff can and should be taken out of politics. Those who so believe fail to understand the fundamental and irreconcilable differences between the two great parties on the question of the tariff.

The Democratic Party advocates, and when in power levies, "tariffs for revenue only." If that term means anything it means what it says. It means that tariffs should be levied for no other purpose than to invite the products of foreign labor, so that revenues may be collected as they are imported.

The Republican Party advocates, and when in power imposes, tariff duties both for protection and for revenue. The Republican Party compels the foreign producers of such articles as we produce to pay a considerable portion of what they get when they sell in our markets into our Treasury, thereby giving American producers an advantage in the American market on all competitive articles. When this is done it places revenue tariffs upon luxuries and expensive articles consumed by the wealthy and well to do.

Admittedly no tariff revenue can be collected on anything produced within the United States. Hence only to the extent that foreign products are imported can a "tariff for revenue only" yield revenue. The importation of merchandise previously made in America necessarily reduces our production and restricts the demand for American labor. Children at a very early age are able to comprehend that if we bring from foreign countries next year the things their fathers made this year their fathers will look in vain for work and they will look in vain for bread.

The present Underwood tariff law was enacted for the avowed purpose of increasing imports. On the 14th day of September, 1914, President Wilson explained to Congress that the World War was preventing these increased importations. In other words, according to the President's positive statement to Congress, the World War compelled the American people to consume the products of American labor in spite of the Underwood tariff law, designed to increase imports.

Suppose this law remains unrepealed until normal conditions are restored throughout Europe. Do you recognize the possibility, yes, the probability, that great quantities of goods produced in countries where wages are much lower than they are here, and where the people are much poorer than we, and therefore much less able to consume even their own products, will flood our markets and force our workmen into the streets? If during reconstruction, and for some years thereafter, there must be enforced idleness, and therefore want, either in America or beyond the seas, where do you prefer the suffering to be? Which would you choose, to remain so prosperous that we can relieve a starving world or also to starve ourselves and depend on a starving world to help us?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

WOULD THIS THREATENED INVASION HURT YOU?

FELLOW CITIZEN: The tariff plank of the Democratic Party in 1912 contains this language: "We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for purposes of revenue only."

This was reaffirmed in their platform of 1916, and the Underwood tariff law was "unreservedly indorsed as truly exemplifying that doctrine." The Democratic national convention this year will neither change nor modify its time-honored position.

The Democratic Party has always been consistent with its avowed belief on this subject. It considers a protective tariff a vicious thing, and that the Constitution gives no warrant for the enactment of such a tariff law. No one should complain of the belief of a great body of patriotic citizens, however erroneous that belief may be, or criticize them for legislating consistently with that belief. Nothing, however, must stand in the way of pointing out the error of their teachings and of showing the disastrous effect of their false notions whenever they have been put into practice.

The Republican Party is equally specific in stating its belief, and it as consistently legislates in harmony with its convictions. The Republican Party believes the Constitution, though silent on the subject, is as comprehensive with respect to industrial preparedness as it is to military preparedness.

Query: Do you believe the Constitution, which all parties admit authorizes protection against military invasions, naval invasions, invasions of coolie labor, invasions of contract labor, invasions of smallpox, yellow fever, and other epidemic perils, denies the American people the right to protect themselves against invasions of the products of cheap labor? Do you think we have the power and that it is wise to protect against invasions of Japanese and Chinese laborers, and have not the power, or that it is unwise, to protect against invasions of the products of the labor of these same people? Is it prudent to protect our health and our lives and imprudent to protect our industries and our markets?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

WHAT WILL WORKINGMEN SAY TO THIS?

FELLOW CITIZEN: In his message to Congress of September 14, 1914, urging what he called a "war emergency tax," President Wilson distinctly stated that the war was preventing the very large increase in imports which the Underwood tariff bill was designed to invite, and he asked that a new revenue measure be provided that would supply the deficiency resulting from loss of importations. This loss in revenue he estimated at $100,000,000.

At the date of that message the average duty collected on all imports was nearly 15 per cent. To have raised this $100,000,000 from customs duties would have required, therefore, the importation of $700,000,000 additional merchandise. The $100,000,000 in customs duties collected at the customhouses would have been added to the cost of the goods when placed upon our markets. Thus the President placed his party on record as deliberately intending to have the American people consume $800,000,000 worth of imported merchandise in place of an equal amount heretofore produced by our own people.

Query: What would have become of our industries had imported merchandise taken the place of our products to the extent of $800,000,000 per annum? What would have become of American workmen had they been deprived of the labor incident to the production of $800,000,000 worth of products? And what would have become of the American farmers had they been deprived of the opportunity to feed these workmen? Remember, coal and other supplies, repairs and maintenance of plants, and especially transportation are largely labor. The direct and indirect loss to labor would have been at least $600,000,000 per annum.

Now that the war is over do you think it will be wise to repeal this Underwood tariff law, which the President proudly declared had been deliberately drafted with intent to supplant American products with foreign products?

There is only one political party pledged to repeal the Underwood bill and to enact in its place a tariff law designed to give American products an advantage over foreign products within American markets. Of course the party that enacted the present law, and in its subsequent platforms has commended it, might amend a few items, but since it contends that Congress has no right to levy tariff duties except for the single purpose of inviting imports so as to collect revenue therefrom, it never will promise and never will give Americans any advantage over foreigners in the American market. Assuming you believe in protection, I will not insult you by asking if you understand that a change of party control must be made now or else wait four years—possibly four long, long years.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

A TARIFF IDEA EASY TO UNDERSTAND.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Not all men who vote the Democratic ticket believe in the doctrine of free trade. Many of them profess such a belief, or in a "tariff for revenue only," which is one and the same thing, for both signify equality of trade opportunity between foreign and home producers in the home market. But some of them want protection in spots. They want protection on all their products and free trade in all the articles they consume.

The people of Florida, for instance, insist that foreign growers of oranges, lemons, and other citrus fruits shall pay into our Treasury so large a per cent of what they get for their products as will prevent their importation. The Louisiana sugar growers have a corresponding desire with respect to their product.

This disposition to violate a professed economic belief to further a selfish end led Gen. Hancock to say: "The tariff is a local issue." The tariff is not a local issue, though the application of tariff laws frequently raises local issues. No country can thrive with protection in spots and free trade generally. Either we should protect Americans in whatever they produce, whether it be labor or some resultant of labor, and thus give them an advantage in American markets, or we should levy our tariffs "for revenue only" and establish an equality of trade opportunity for everybody, independent of race, nationality, or domicile. We must be nationalists or internationalists.

We sometimes hear it said that "the Democratic Party is becoming a protection party." But until the party as a party believes in protection as a sound economic principle and publicly confesses its previous error, it should not be asked to enact a protective tariff law. If you have confidence only in the old allopathic school of medicine, do you think it would be prudent to employ a homeopath to treat you allopathically?

Query: Do you think it would be any more difficult for a physician to make a wise prescription according to a school of medicine in which he does not believe—though he might attempt it rather than lose his practice—than for a political party, on record as believing a protective tariff both vicious and unconstitutional, to formulate consistent and workable protective tariff schedules? Do you think a political party any more than an individual should be asked to violate its convictions?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

THIS POINT IS WELL WORTH CONSIDERING.

FELLOW CITIZEN: All political parties, and so far as I know all Americans, believe in excluding Chinese and Japanese laborers. The reason is purely selfish. These orientals are willing to work at wages which Americans will not accept and to live as Americans do not live.

The Republican Party not only excludes these laborers but it levies protective tariff duties upon the products of their labor. To be a little more specific, it requires the importers from China and Japan of cheap-made goods to pay into our Treasury so large a share of what they receive for them as to prevent their importation. This is done for the sole purpose of giving the American laborer an advantage over these oriental laborers within the American market.

The Democratic Party excludes these oriental laborers and then places tariff duties upon the products of their labor so low as to invite their importation, so as to collect tariff revenues thereon. Democratic tariffs being "for revenue only" are so designed as to insure the importation of the various articles mentioned in their tariff schedules.

Do you see any advantage in compelling Chinese and Japanese laborers to remain and work in their own countries, consume the food from their own farms, and then permitting them to send the products of their labor into our markets over letting the laborers themselves come and feed from our farms while they produce the same things in direct competition with our high-priced labor? Would you not just as soon have these oriental laborers compete with you on your own soil as to have the product of their labor compete with the product of your labor in your own market? One political party excludes both cheap laborer and the products of cheap labor. The other party excludes the cheap laborer and invites the products of cheap labor. Every intelligent American citizen owes it to himself to determine which policy is preferable and to vote his convictions. It is my purpose in these letters simply to assist those who desire to know just what the two great parties profess to believe, what they promise to do, and what they actually do do when in power.

Cordially, yours, ABRAHAM ADAMS.

DOES EXPERIENCE TEACH US ANYTHING?

FELLOW CITIZEN: At the close of the Civil War we occupied a unique position. We had resources unexcelled and resourcefulness unequaled. For 50 years, except the four years covered by President Cleveland's last administration, the economic policy of the Nation was dominated by protectionists. It is well to remember that during Mr. Cleveland's first term the Senate remained Republican and rejected the Mills tariff bill, which passed the Democratic House. The United States Senate in 1885 alone prevented our markets being thrown open to equality of trade opportunity for all the world.

With the exception, therefore, of the four years from March 4, 1893, to March 4, 1897, the policy of the Government for a half century was cooperation and encouragement. It fostered every industry and fathered none. It did not build and operate railroads, but did encourage its citizens to establish the greatest transportation systems in the world. It did not erect factories, but it did make profitable the erection of factories. It opened no mines and operated no farms. Recognizing that man gets his chiefest happiness out of his achievements, for 50 years the Government encouraged each citizen to "achieve and be happy."

At the end of this half century of protective tariffs and similar fostering policies, with but one break of four years, which brings us to but not into the World War, our farms were producing more than the farms of any other country on the map; our mines were yielding gold by trainload annually; we were bringing from the great Northwest, by railway and coastwise ships, iron ore in such quantities that the portion left on the soil of Ohio alone exceeded the production of any other nation; and we were pumping twice as much petroleum as all other nations. During these 50 years our people built as many miles of railroad as all Europe, and these roads before the first rate was fixed by law carried our freight at one-third the European rate. Because of the prompt exchange of our unparalleled wage scale for the comforts of life and the immediate return thereof to labor, our domestic trade had reached a figure five times as large as the aggregate international trade of creation; our shops and factories were turning out more finished products that all the shops and all the factories of Great Britain and France and Germany combined, plus five thousand millions dollars' worth every 12 months, and we were paying to ourselves and receiving from each other as much in wages as all the rest of the human family.

Query: Does it occur to you that the pay roll of the United States, equal to that of all the rest of the world, is our most valuable asset? Do you also realize that the best way to preserve this pay roll is by pursuing the policy that created it?

Cordially, yours, ABRAHAM ADAMS.

DO WE HAVE AS MUCH WISDOM AS WE HAVE KNOWLEDGE?

FELLOW CITIZEN: In a former letter I referred to our enormous industrial pay roll, equal to that of all the rest of the world. Permit me to enlarge that thought and to ask you to consider its manifold relationships and effect upon each and every class and condition of our people.

The wealthy no less than the poor spend or expend their entire income, and no one can spend or expend without helping others. The more permanent the expenditure the more it assists labor. Incomes, like wages, are spent for necessaries, or comforts, or luxuries, or foolishness, or they are expended for a house, or a bond, or a share of stock, or they are deposited in a bank and some one else uses them. Let us assume that the wage earner spends most of his for food and clothes. The merchant who receives it as promptly pays it to the producer of these things, and the producer either keeps it as his compensation or he pays it again to labor. In either event it goes again for food and clothes and again to labor.

William McKinley expressed the belief that wages went from labor to merchant, from merchant to producer, and from producer back again to labor at least ten times in a year. Conceding this to be conservative, then 1,000,000 men, each earning $1,000 a year, will receive an aggregate of $1,000,000,000 in wages, which by completing the circuit as above illustrated, ten times a year, swells our domestic commerce $10,000,000,000. The opposite is also true. One million men thrown out of employment cuts down our domestic commerce $10,000,000,000 per annum.

Manifestly, we are all dependent directly or indirectly upon the American pay roll, and in a very true sense the American people are kinfolk.

Query: How can we best insure the perpetuation of this enormous and incomprehensible aggregate of American wages? Shall the Government guarantee it? What would the guaranty of the Government be worth? Can the Government control the laws of nature? Can it reverse the movements of the tide or suspend the laws of economics? Can Congress repeal the law of supply and demand? This much the Government can do. It can give the American producer, whether his product be labor or some resultant of labor, an advantage in the American market over every person who chooses to live elsewhere than under our flag. It can also exclude from our soil everyone who refuses to respect our flag, and it can deport all who seek the overthrow of our institutions. If we do not know, we ought to learn by what policies we have grown to be the admiration or the envy of the world. Knowing this, do we also know how to preserve our greatness and how to improve our conditions? Do we have as much wisdom as we have knowledge?

Cordially, yours, ABRAHAM ADAMS.

SHOULD AMERICA LEGISLATE FOR AMERICANS?

FELLOW CITIZEN: Speaking before the National Grain Dealers' Association of Baltimore, September 25, 1916, the President of the United States used this language: "I want to see America pitted against the world, not in selfishness but in brains."

Thus aptly did he express the free-trade theory, for admittedly a protective tariff has its root in selfishness. Its single purpose is to afford the citizen a selfish advantage in his own market.

Japan has a population of 393 to the square mile, and 70 per cent of her 60,000,000 people live by farming 16 per cent of her territory. Her remaining territory is untillable. We have a population of only 30, and Germany did have only 60, to the square mile.

Japan entered the field of competitive manufacture about 25 years ago, and to-day the single town of Osaka has nearly or quite 1,500 factories in operation. The latest official reports give the Japanese wage scale for men from 34 to 42 cents per day of 12 hours, women 20 per cent less than men, and children still less. There are no child-labor laws or limitations of woman's work in Japan. Our average wage scale is more than ten times as high for a day only two-thirds as long.

For a number of years the people of Japan have been buying American-made automatic looms, and some of their purchases have been in trainload lots. They also buy American cotton in million-pound consignments.

How does all this affect us? Japan exported to the United States during 1917, in round figures, $650,000 worth of merchandise for each day of that year. These exports included the product of these American looms, clay goods, glass, toilet articles, brushes, baseballs, and many other articles of daily use wherein labor is the principal element. With the exception of raw silks, Japanese silk fabrics, fancy glass, and some bric-a-brac, these exports to the United States were practically all competitive products. To the extent that we consumed them we limited the market for like articles made by Americans who were fed from American farms.

Query: Do you think the American manufacturers if "pitted against the world [Japan], not in selfishness but in brains," can continue to pay our scale of wages? American-made looms and other machinery operate just as efficiently under the touch of the deft and skilled Japanese as for Americans. Do you think it wise to legislate unselfishly, or should America legislate for Americans?

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

DOES HISTORY REPEAT ITSELF?

FELLOW CITIZEN: The Napoleonic wars, in which most of Europe was engaged, ended a little over 100 years ago. The Democratic Party enacted a "tariff for revenue only" law in 1816, which yielded an average tariff duty of 22 per cent. Before we entered the World War the present Democratic Party "tariff for revenue only" law yielded less than 9 per cent. It is now yielding about 6½ per cent.

What was the effect of the Democratic 22 per cent tariff 100 years ago, during and following reconstruction? Horace Greeley, speaking of this period, says: "Our factories went down like grass before the mower. Agriculture and labor soon followed. In New England fully one-quarter of all property went through the sheriff's mill." Thomas Benton, Democatic Senator from Missouri, in his Thirty Years in Congress, says: "No sale except by the sheriff or the marshal. No purchase except by the creditor or some hoarder of money. No demand for labor, no sound of the hammer except that of the auctioneer knocking down property." Woodrow Wilson, in the third volume of his History of the American People, describes how industry had sprung up during the Napoleonic wars, and what happened to it when these wars ended. He says of the war period: "Distinct manufacturing regions began sensibly to develop in the Middle States and in the East with interests and characteristics which statesmen could not afford to overlook." Then of the peace period following: "It was manifestly injurious to every young industry that a flood of English imports should continue to pour into the country. The remedy was a protective tariff, such as Mr. Hamilton had wished to see at first, and the young Republican leaders of Congress did not hesitate to advocate and establish it." [The italics are mine.]

Query: Do you see at least a possibility that history may repeat itself? A protective tariff, according to Mr. Wilson, the historian, proved a remedy after one-quarter of New England had been sold by the sheriff, and when, according to Senator Benton, there was "no sound of the hammer except that of the auctioneer." If a protective tariff will work a cure when the disease has reached that stage, would it not have worked even better as a preventive? The Democratic Party believes a protective tariff a vicious thing in itself, and a violation of the Constitution in addition. The Republican Party believes a protective tariff both wise and constitutional. On which side of this great economic issue do you stand? The happiness of every man, woman, and child in the United States, and especially every laborer and every farmer who feeds a laborer, is involved. Will you vote to interpose a preventive or wait a few years and apply "the remedy"?

WHAT MAKES A MARKET?

FELLOW CITIZEN: What are the necessary elements of a market?

We frequently hear it said that all the world is in need. Does a naked need make a market? Possibly you know needy individuals to whom you would not seek to sell anything. The two essential elements to a market are need plus an ability to pay.

It is true that all the world is in need, and it is likewise true that the United States is the only country of any considerable size where the people are able to pay for what they need. All other peoples can produce. In fact, they must produce or starve. After they have obtained the raw materials, which they must have, and have converted these into finished products, where are they likely to seek to sell? They certainly will not attempt to sell to others as poor as themselves.

Even the people of these bankrupt countries must buy raw material, like cotton, wool, many of the metals, and coal. But do you think they are likely to buy from the United States finished products that they can produce?

As you already know, the author of the Underwood tariff bill, its friends, and supporters in both Houses, and the President of the United States are on record as saying that it was not their purpose to protect American labor, but on the contrary the bill was designed to invite imports, so as to collect the revenue incident thereto.

If we remain prosperous and most of the other nations remain unable to pay even the interest on the money they owe us, are they not likely to ship a good share of what they produce to our ports? If they do not send it here, where will they send it? If the tariff law remains unrepealed, which was enacted for the sole purpose of inviting imports—"tariff for revenue only"—what is likely to happen? What, in your judgment, is certain to happen?

Do you intend so to vote as to make certain the continuance of a tariff designed to solicit a flood of pauper-made goods to take the place of products of American labor? Or are you going to vote to protect your own country first and then assist the world to the extent of your ability? A great many people think this the most important issue of the campaign.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

WE MUST KEEP AMERICAN LABOR EMPLOYED.

FELLOW CITIZEN: A bankrupt world owes the United States $9,000,000,000, the interest on which is past due and unpaid.

That you may the better understand the real situation, I call your attention to the following appalling facts: At the close of the war between France and Germany, 1871, France was compelled to pay her enemy $1,000,000,000 indemnity. At the close of the World War France owes her allies and associates over $5,000,000,000 borrowed money. Little Italy, with a population before the war of only 35,000,000, now owes her friends as a result of the war over $4,000,000,000, also borrowed. Germany, with much territory and all her colonies taken from her, is trying to compromise her indemnity at about $25,000,000,000. Austria-Hungary had 260,000 square miles of territory and a population of 51,000,000 people before the war. She loses over two-thirds of this territory, nearly one-half of her population, including practically all her coal and iron deposits. Her indemnity has not yet been agreed upon, but it will not be less than the last dollar she can possibly pay.

Query: Do you prefer to have the shops and factories in the United States produce in the hope of selling to these countries or with the certainty of selling to the people of the United States? America could survive, our people could even prosper, though the rest of the world did not exist. We can still prosper though we lose all the interest due from foreign nations, yes, though we never get a dollar of either interest or principal. The only thing which we can not do and thrive is to surrender the opportunity to exchange an honest day's work for the comforts of life. We can stand anything except nonemployment of American labor. There is no suffering so severe and nothing so certain to breed revolution as to have the millions of hitherto industrious Americans walking the streets in vain for work and returning to their homes at night to find their wives in rags and their children crying for bread.

In your judgment, what is the best insurance against nonemployment and its attending evils? Shall we preserve the markets we have, our own markets, or shall we throw them open to all the world and take potluck with the world? The clown in the circus announced a very human sentiment when he said, "Of all my father's family, I love myself the best." There are many citizens of this fair land who, "of all people in the world, love Americans the best."

Some of these will vote to protect Americans by protecting the American markets.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

JUST COMMON HORSE SENSE.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Wars, no less than lawsuits, are the result of ambiguities and uncertainties. Courts interpret contracts and wills only when their meaning is in doubt. The League of Nations is a contract between your country and more than 30 others. Do you think admitted uncertainties in its terms should be removed? Or should they be left for settlement by the league itself, the proposed Worth court, or possibly on the field of battle?

If all your interests were vested in the United States Steel Corporation as completely as they are centered in the United States of America, so that you could see nothing ahead, either for yourself or for your children, except in that one corporation, and a contract was pending to affiliate your company with the Bethlehem Steel, would you, as a stockholder, vote to have the contract signed before you had read it? Would you ask your club or your preacher or your family physician what the instrument meant or might not mean? Would you be influenced by the result of a referendum to college students, not one in a thousand of whom had read it, and not one of the entire bunch had ever drafted, studied, or listened to a legal opinion on the meaning of a contract?

Men who have drawn and interpreted contracts all their lives, as well as those who are familiar with international treaties and their effect upon nations, widely differ in their interpretations of several covenants of the League of Nations. Do you think it the part of wisdom for your country to incur the obligations of membership without express reservations making it absolutely certain just what we are giving up, and what, if anything, we are to get in return? Whatever you may think of the main question of a league of nations, do you desire the United States Senate to ratify an uncertainty? The treaty can be made certain only by amendments or reservations. Are you for or against them?

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

THIS COULD LEAD TO A PRETTY MESS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: For the present please consider the single question of our right to withdraw from the League of Nations after having joined.

The Constitution of the United States is silent on the subject of withdrawals. For 75 years the right of secession was the subject of acrimonious debate. Finally certain States attempted to exercise what they thoroughly believed was their sovereign right, but the other States successfully resisted. If the Constitution had permitted withdrawals the seceding States would have been allowed to go in peace. If it had forbidden withdrawals no State would have attempted secession. The awful war between the States was made possible through an uncertainty in the document that bound the States together. Do you think the right of the United States to withdraw from the League of Nations should be left in similar doubt? The language of the withdrawal provision is as follows:

"Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal."

Who is to determine whether these obligations have been fulfilled or not? It is an easy matter to make claims against a nation. Many are now pending against the United States, in some of which—the claim of the Republic of Colombia, for instance—the amount only is in dispute.

President Wilson insists that the nation seeking to withdraw will be the sole judge of its right to withdraw. Very few lawyers agree with Mr. Wilson. Therefore a majority of Senators demand that the right to withdraw shall be absolute and unconditional. They also insist that the other nations shall agree to this, or at least be estopped by their failure to object.

What do you think about it? All that you hold dear may be involved in this one little paragraph. Are you prepared to take the chances, or do you want that question determined now?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

WHAT SHOULD WE DO ABOUT THIS?

FELLOW CITIZEN: Until the several States of this Union had adopted the Constitution, each State had the sovereign right to declare war against whom it would and the right to fight on either side of any controversy.

With the adoption of the Constitution, each State surrendered a goodly portion of its sovereignty and each State authorized the Union of States to conscript its sons and send them under any sky in the defense of any cause. Do you realize that if the United States joins the League of Nations, as the States joined the Union, we must either reserve our sovereignty or merge it with over 30 other nations, largely as the several States merged their sovereignties when they joined the union of States?

Our red-blooded fathers fought to establish the independence of the United States of America. They succeeded. As soon as the treaty was submitted to the Senate certain other red-blooded Americans formed an association to preserve the independence of the United States. Will these men be equally successful? Do you intend to assist them or obstruct them?

The President recognizes that to join the League of Nations under the terms of the treaty as presented involves what he was pleased to call "great sacrifices." But he recommends that these sacrifices be made for the good of the world. How much of our sovereignty are you willing to "sacrifice" in the hope that it will benefit the world at large as much as it will harm ourselves? Are you ready to merge with Siam, Japan, Haiti, Algeria, and 30 others? Algeria has 2,000,000 people, 50,000 of whom are civilized.

Every true American wants to help the world, for it certainly needs help. Some of it is illiterate, some immoral, not a little of it criminally disposed, and all of it financially embarrassed.

But would it be better for the world—forgetting ourselves—for us to join a world-wide union, and thus establish common interests and standards, somewhat above the lowest and considerably below the highest? Or would it be better for the world at large—forgetting ourselves—that we set an example of upright living and demonstrate that temporal prosperity and happiness are the natural fruits of virtue, industry, and justice according to law? This will not preclude, but, on the contrary, insure our assistance wherever and whenever we see assistance deserved. Had we better preserve our ability to assist, and our independence in each case when assistance is asked, or confer upon an aggregation of needy nations the power to control our international charities as well as our military and naval operations?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: You should bear in mind that there is this marked difference between the League of Nations, which the treaty seeks to create, and the United States of America, which the Constitution did create:

The League of Nations will have no army, no navy, and possess no right to conscript soldiers or impose taxes. The council of the league or the assembly—each having exactly the same jurisdiction "in all matters affecting the peace of the world"—is to determine what action shall be taken in each emergency as it arises. These official bodies are also to distribute the burden of maintaining peace as in their judgment shall seem expedient. These burdens can not be borne by the several member nations in proportion to population. Three-fourths of the nations are barely able, and some of them unable, to bear their own burdens. Naturally and inevitably the greater burdens will be placed upon the country best able to bear burdens.

The United States and Japan will be the only members both solvent and powerful. No others of international importance are able to meet their financial obligations as they accrue.

Would you expect the league to call upon Japan to quell insurrection, suppress rebellion, expel invaders, "preserve territorial integrity against external aggression," or to assume mandates anywhere in Europe? On whom would the league be likely to place these burdens? Where is the league now seeking to place the mandate over Armenia? In this connection you should not forget that if we accept we must conduct the affairs of Armenia under the direction of the league, report our doings to the league, and, in the event of an issue arising, we, being a party in interest, will have no voice in its determination. Have you ever had experience in a joint deal for joint benefit and you the only solvent member? How did you come out?

Not less than a dozen wars are now raging in Europe, and this does not include insurrection and bloodshed in Ireland and in Russia. If you want to place the United States at the beck and call of an association composed of 30 insolvent nations plus perhaps a half dozen small but solvent nations you should so register your wish at the polls in November. If we are going to assume the burden, we ought to begin at once, call our boys again to the colors, recross the sea, and resume the task of "making the world safe for democracy."

Do you recognize that you have never been, and never will be, called upon to help solve a question so momentous? Now, if ever, is the time to vote your judgment. Allow no one to tell you how to vote.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Article VIII of the proposed League of Nations is too long to quote, but it expressly provides that the "league council shall formulate plans for the reduction of armament." It further provides that after a member nation has approved the limit recommended by the council, such nation shall neither create a larger army nor build a larger navy, "without the unanimous consent of said council."

Acting in good faith, the United States must approve whatever limit of Army and Navy the council recommends. Then suppose Japan or Germany—one or both—continues its propaganda in Mexico until we are invaded by that reckless and warring people or until we are driven to invasion. He who does not recognize the possibility of trouble with Mexico is blind, and if trouble comes we will need a reasonably large Army. Will Japan promptly consent that we increase our Army to meet a condition that she has inspired?

You may forget the possibility of foreign propaganda in Mexico and still the possibility of trouble remains. Therefore a majority of the Senate adopted reservation No. 10, containing this language:

"The United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war."

What is your attitude toward this reservation? Do you want your country dependent upon the consent of each and every member of the council of the League of Nations whenever the question of defending our own borders arises? Do you desire the United States Senate to place your country in a position where under any contingency, in order to protect her own firesides, she must either secure unanimous consent to increase her army, or, by increasing it without unanimous consent, violate the terms of the League of Nations and thereby commit an act of war against every one of the more than 30 member nations to each of whom she is beholden by the terms of the treaty?

Every foreign country, with the possible exception of Japan, is willing that we shall reserve the right to increase our Army "when threatened with invasion or when engaged in war." Only the present administration and its followers ask us to surrender the right.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: The long-discussed Article X of the proposed League of Nations contains this language:

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league."

The President has many times explained that we are safe, notwithstanding this express obligation, because no army can be created or troops sent abroad except by order of Congress. Are you willing to make a contract and then have to depend upon Congress to break it in order to keep our boys at home?

A contract between landowners containing the above-quoted covenant would be a guaranty against trespass, either by the parties themselves or by strangers. Following the line of reasoning indicated by the President, no farmer, though a party to the contract, could be compelled to send his hired man to drive the trespassing stock of a stranger out of his neighbor's corn. Of course, he could not. All he could be compelled to do would be to pay the damages. Not every contract can be enforced by mandamus or injunction. But damages resulting from breaches of contract can always be recovered, provided the delinquent party is solvent.

You should not forget that a world court, which everyone favors, is to be created, with jurisdiction to try and render judgment against nations that disregard treaties, exactly as State and Federal courts try and determine cases where individuals violate contracts. Senator Root has already sailed to assist in the creation of such a court. I suggest that you ask your lawyer what would be our present status if we had been a party to a treaty containing the above-quoted covenant from Article X at the time Belgium was invaded by Germany and the council of the league had designated the United States "to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity" of Belgium and we had failed promptly to act. He will probably tell you that under the terms of such a contract the United States would have to fight or pay. Whatever he may tell you, do you want to assume the risk? Do you or do you not prefer to play safe?

Without wishing to escape our share of the responsibility for the peace of the world, a majority of the Senate voted to reserve to the United States the right to determine where, when, under what circumstances, and upon which side of international controversies our sons shall fight. If you were to police a bad street in a big city, would you want an organized band of gunmen to tell you whom you should arrest? If we are to preserve the peace of the world, do you want to be outvoted by disturbers of the peace?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Under Article XIII of the proposed League of Nations, the members promise that they "will secure and maintain freedom of communication and transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league." You must assume, I think, that this express language means something. What does it mean?

The third of the President's famous 14 conditions of peace demanded "the removal of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all nations." Just before sailing he promised that the treaty "should prevent economic rivalries in definite and binding terms." The above quoted covenant constitutes the President's fulfillment of these pledges.

Think it out for yourself: How can "economic rivalries" be prevented or the "removal of economic barriers" or "the establishment of an equality of trade conditions" be secured and maintained between the United States and Japan, for instance, short of admitting Japanese laborers without restriction and the products of Japanese labor without customs duties? How can "freedom of communication and equitable treatment for the commerce of all members of the league," which the treaty pledges each member to secure and maintain, be effected without race equality and free trade? Are you ready for these?

If the question ever arises whether the provisions of the treaty forbid protective tariffs or the exclusion of oriental labor, the United States will be in a hopeless minority in any tribunal that determines it. In fact, the United States being a party to the controversy she can have, under the terms of the proposed league, no voice whatever in its determination. All other members of the league being anxious for free access to our markets will have to do violence to their own economic interests in order to do justice to ours. How would you expect them to decide a question where all the world is interested on one side and only the United States on the other, we being denied any voice, but bound by a contract at best of doubtful interpretation? On the field of battle only, and with England's aid, would we be equal to the forces already committed to race equality.

The reservations to the league covenants, adopted by a majority of the United States Senate, expressly safeguard our right to exclude from citizenship and domicile whomsoever we will, and our equally important right to levy, either for revenue or for protection, whatever tariffs the wisdom of Congress may from time to time dictate. How do you stand on that question? If the people are to decide, should the people consider?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: The reparation commission provided for in the treaty with Germany is entirely outside and independent of the proposed League of Nations. Its mission is not to maintain peace by preventing future wars, but to collect damages because of the recent war. While it is not so stated in the treaty, the intent is everywhere apparent that this commission is to so administer its powers as to prevent Germany from ever again being strong enough to wage war. To this end its powers are very broad. It is even given express jurisdiction over both the export and the import trade of Germany.

While it is true that these powers may never be exercised to the injury of the United States, yet a majority of the Senate, seeking to play safe, voted to remove the possibility of interference with our trade with Germany and adopted reservation No. 8, as follows:

"The United States understands that the reparation commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference."

Foreign nations owe the United States over $9,000,000,000, the interest on which exceeds $450,000,000 per annum. The payment even of this interest will strain the credit of all of them and possibly the friendship of some. If the United States prospers, as we hope she will, and her trade with Germany grows, as it should grow, who will dare guarantee that this commission—controlled by our debtors—may not go the limit of its jurisdiction to establish "equality of trade conditions," which the treaty pledges each nation to secure and maintain?

How do you stand on that proposition? Do you prefer to reserve our right to trade with whom we will, to any extent we can, and upon as favorable terms as we may be able, from time to time, to establish? Or do you wish to permit this "nightmare" of possible foreign selfish interference to disturb the slumber of both this and succeeding industrial generations? The American people are soon to have the opportunity to express their preference. Shall we have "liberty of trade" or "equality of trade conditions" as interpreted by a foreign commission on which, in the event of an issue, we will have no representation?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: The census of 1810 shows $560 invested in factory, equipment, and working capital for each wage earner employed, while the average wage of wage earners was $240 per annum. Each subsequent census has shown a larger and larger investment of money for each wage earner employed, until in 1915 over $3,000 had been invested in plant, equipment, and working capital for each wage earner. Meantime the average wage had increased from $240 to $580 per annum. In 105 years we had multiplied the average annual wage by 2½, but it had been necessary to multiply invested capital per wage earner by 6. The present census will probably show that in 110 years we have multiplied the average wage by 5, but in order to accomplish it ten times as much actual cash per wage earner has had to be furnished by some one. Do not overlook the fact that while wages were increasing interest rates went down.

If profits had all been divided and distributed to labor as fast as earned, who would now be furnishing the necessary money to build, equip, and operate our industrial plants, our railroads, our public utilities, our mines, lumber camps, and other concerns that now afford both skilled and unskilled laborers the opportunity to feed and clothe themselves and their families? If some one tells you the Government could furnish the money, ask him where the Government would get it. Where does the Government now and always get its revenue? Do you consider the Government a money making or a money spending institution? Should the Government feed the citizen and clothe his family? Or should the Government protect the citizen in his liberties, so that he may both feed and clothe himself and furnish the opportunity to others to do the same?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: An ancestor of mine was very thrifty. He was engaged in a productive industry, worked early and late, denied himself every luxury and many comforts, paid only current wages, invested his profits in enlarging his plant, and died a rich man. He bequeathed me $100,000, which I invested in a new and untried industry. Like my ancestor, I employed labor, paid only the current wage, but during the year my aggregate pay roll exceeded $200,000, yet I made a net profit of $50,000 for myself. Everyone says this is too much, but will the fact that I have made 50 per cent net on my invested capital insure me from competition? Will it not invite competition?

How can I keep my profits—$50,000—away from labor? If I convert it into cash and lock it in a safe-deposit box, labor will get none of it. But if I enlarge my plant, labor will get most of it. If I give a fine wedding to my daughter and decorate the house with cut flowers, what share of their cost will labor get? If I buy for her an automobile, or build for her a house and furnish it ever so lavishly, what share of that aggregate expenditure will go to labor? Ore in the mine, coal in the ground, clay for brick or chinaware, sand for glass, and lumber in the forest are each relatively worthless until the hand of labor has touched them. All the things I buy are more than 80 per cent the direct or the indirect result of labor, and for their production labor has been paid a wage at which it was glad to work.

Who do you say has been injured by the fact that my ancestor accumulated wealth in the same general way that practically all fortunes have been made?

Please do not think I am trying to cajole you or to suggest that pay envelopes are just as desirable as dividend checks. They are not. But will it not be well for your children if you teach them that fully nine-tenths of those who now receive dividend checks began with pay envelopes, and that the exception is usually some one whose ancestors began, as mine did, with pay envelopes? Most men are the product of the teaching they get at home.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: In a certain city 1,000 men are out of employment. There is nothing for them to do. In a bank in that city $1,000,000 is out of employment. There is nothing for it to do. In the foothills back of that city 10,000,000 tons of coal is out of employment. There is nothing for it to do.

The unemployed men offer the bank their joint note for the money and propose mining the coal. But the officers of the bank will not loan money that does not belong to them on the note of 1,000 men each out of employment.

Then some men who have succeeded as coal operators offer their joint note, and a mortgage on the coal mine in which they have already invested all they are worth, and the bank makes the loan, and the mine is opened. Did capital open that mine? No! Capital was idle—it was starving. Did labor open the mine? No! Labor was also starving. Is there a third element—a third factor—a third party, sometimes called management, to every successful business? Did you ever know a farmer to lift a mortgage by hard work? No! Hard work never paid for a farm. But hard work plus management have paid for many farms, and when the management has been sufficiently good less work has been required. The same is true of every business. Whenever you hear of a failure in business you may know it is because management has buckled—it has failed to function. When you hear it said that a business has failed for want of capital, explain to your children that here, too, the fault was with management. Management attempted to do too much with its available capital.

But suppose the coal mine in question is a success. How much do you say capital should receive? What share should go to management? Should management be content with ordinary wages? Labor can always be secured for the required wage. Capital can usually be obtained with the required security, and at a reasonable rate of interest. The only element of successful business not easily obtained is management.

Who took the risk? Capital did not. It was secured. Labor did not. It was paid a wage at which it was glad to work, and paid every week. Should the risk be paid for? No one, and no insurance company, will insure success in coal mining or in any other business.

I know that you will pardon me when I suggest that you explain to your children that when they are able to demonstrate that they have aptitude for management, the requisite vision to understand the difference between a business proposition and a venture, and the courage and self-reliance essential to success, they can fix the price on their services and the world will reward them beyond anything they dare dream.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Sir Hugh Bell, the great ironmaster of England, once told this incident in my presence: A laboring man said to him: "Sir Hugh, I ought to support my family on three days' work per week, and when I work six days I feel that I am robbing some poor fellow of three days' work." Sir Hugh replied: "Without discussing whether your happiness would be increased or your culture improved or your worth as a citizen enhanced by three idle days per week, I want to remind you that if you could support your family on three days' work per week, and you actually worked six days, you would have money enough to hire some poor fellow for three days. Please do not suppose that by remaining idle you are giving some one work. By remaining idle you are depriving your fellow man of work."

You will notice that Sir Hugh argued upon the theory that there is a limitless amount of work to be done, and he was right.

I do not know how many hours a day a rat works. Possibly not to exceed three or four hours a day, and I am not prepared to say that a man who is willing to live as a rat lives will need to work any more hours a day. Neither do I know how many hours a day a man must work to live as Americans live. I do know, however, that in countries where people work no more than rats they live like rats. Little work in any country spells poor houses, or no houses at all; poor clothes, or no clothes at all; no churches, schools, hospitals, or libraries. I also know that during the period when Americans worked efficiently for long hours they accumulated a per capita wealth unequaled in the history of the world, and developed a people the best fed, the best clothed, the best housed, the best educated, enjoying more comforts, far more luxuries, suffering less individual privation, possessing more public buildings, better public roads, cheaper transportation facilities, and were able to get more of the comforts of life from a day's toil than anywhere else on this earth at any previous time.

Query: Is American civilization a failure? Are American institutions a disgrace? Can we improve them by uprooting? Can we exalt the lowest by pulling down the highest? Will we make better citizens of our children by emphasizing human imperfections? Will we increase their happiness by encouraging revolt at everything they do not like? Does contentment consist of idleness? Whom do you wish your children to emulate? Shall the active, the vigilant, the brave, the successful be their example, or shall they find solace in the harangues of the agitator? Does your daily comment on passing events and public men point your children upward or downward?

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Many times in the past attempts have been made to improve human conditions by the more or less arbitrary process of confiscation. This is sometimes called "transfer of property," as in the French Revolution, and sometimes "conscription of wealth," of which we now hear so much.

Evidently there are more people in the world to-day determined to repeat these experiments than ever before. Among these confiscationists there are several distinct groups, and many more who entertain such indefinite ideas on the subject that it is impossible to classify them. They are simply angry at a civilization that permits large accumulations, and they favor any movement in the direction of equalization.

It is my purpose to assist the thoughtful. If perchance you are not of that number a mistake has been made in sending you this letter.

For a generation Andrew Carnegie established one industry after another until before he retired from active business he was mining both coal and iron, making structural steel and armor plate, equipping railroads, building ships, making wire to fence an empire, bridging rivers and streams in every State, finding a foreign market for millions of products of American labor, fed from American farms, and directly affording an opportunity for thousands of skilled and unskilled laborers to exchange their toil for the comforts of life. Indirectly he furnished employment for vastly more than directly.

Then he retired from business, leaving most of his accumulated wealth still employed in the enterprises he had created and used his income, and gradually the principal, in philanthropy, as distinguished from charity. He sought to help those who were striving to help themselves. He builded libraries for cities, towns, and colleges, and established institutes to teach young men to be more efficient, and therefore more self-reliant.

Query: In which field of human endeavor did Andrew Carnegie best serve his day and generation? In which way was his marvelous vision and greater energy more conducive to happiness? Is the civilization radically wrong or substantially correct that produces Andrew Carnegies?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: The population of the world is estimated at a little over 1,500,000,000. That part of the earth's surface, the improvements thereon, and other property, over which man exercises ownership, is estimated to have a market value of somewhat less than $750,000,000,000. The per capita wealth of the world therefore is less than $500.

This is not the first time in history when wealth has been unpopular. While the French Revolution did not stop with confiscation, confiscation of wealth was its primary object. After mentioning "a million persons stabbed, drowned, shot, beheaded, or hunted to death, wars started that strewed Europe with 5,000,000 dead, a whole nation bathed in blood, bankrupted in morals and rotted in character," Dr. Hinman declares, "all these things, hideous and appalling as they may be, distracting and absorbing as they are, were but collossal incidents. The chief movement through all this sea of blood and wilderness of death was the 'transfer of property.'"

Sovietism in Russia began by stripping the bourgeoise—those who possess something—and turning it over to the proletariat—those who possess nothing. Now that the leaders have enriched themselves, they are seeking to create the impression that in the future they will be conservative, and that property rights will be hereafter respected. After successful raids even highwaymen might be suspected of a desire to have the "right of possession" respected.

Imagine, if you will, the wealth of the world conscripted, and, if such a thing were possible, converted into food, clothes, fuel, and rented quarters, and apportioned equally among all the people of the world. How long would it last? Prepaid rent, clothes in the closet, food in the pantry, and fuel in the cellar, costing $500 for each man, woman, and child in the world, would place the entire human family on "easy street," would it not? How long would it be before the name of the street would have to be changed?

Most of those who demand the confiscation of wealth seek to accomplish it by processes of taxation. They want the wealth of the Nation taxed away from the present owners and consumed in the interest of all. While they fail to formulate their plans with any degree of definiteness, the logic of their position is that we shall stop worrying, stop trying to accumulate, work little, and save less, and simply live on the accumulation of the ages.

Query: Why do so many good people believe these things? Would profligacy on the part of the entire race work results less disastrous than profligacy in single families? Is it, or is it not, true that the accumulation of one generation becomes the invested capital of the next? And must it be wisely used if it is to yield even a living?

These are interesting questions, are they not?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Henry George, the great apostle of single tax, was a very able man. I do not say he was a very wise man. Great intellects frequently, as in this instance, lead to great errors.

Every advocate of single-tax legislation is a faithful disciple of Henry George. No one has added a new argument, stated an old argument with greater force, or reached a different conclusion. None of his followers apologize for anything Henry George ever said or refuse to stand or fall with the great originator of the scheme. Therefore to quote Henry George is to quote the best authority and all authority.

The great textbook of single taxes is Henry George's Progress and Poverty. The author begins his argument with the proposition that God made the land, the sea, and the air for his children collectively, and never granted the exclusive right of any part thereof to king or subject. All pretended grants and conveyances therefore are fictitious. From these premises he draws the conclusion that all natural resources still belong to the people collectively, and therefore confiscation in the interest of all is justifiable.

On page 401 of Progress and Poverty Mr. George says:

"But a question of method remains. How shall we do it? We should satisfy the law of justice. We should meet all economic requirements by at one stroke abolishing all private titles, declaring all land public property, and letting it out to the highest bidder in lots to suit."

On page 403 he says:

"I do not propose either to purchase or to confiscate property in land. The first would be unjust; the second needless. Let the individuals who now hold it still retain, if they want to, possession of what they are pleased to call their land; let them continue to call it their land; let them buy and sell and bequeath and devise it. We may safely leave them the shell if we take the kernel. It is not necessary to confiscate land; it is only necessary to confiscate rent. * * * We already take some rent in taxation. We have only to make some changes in our mode of taxation to take it all."

Thus you will see that Henry George, with all his intellect, was mentally dishonest. His heartbeats were sympathetic, but his mind wabbled. He was unable to see anything dishonest when I sold my acres or my lot, invested the proceeds in stocks and bonds, and then by my vote exempted my property from taxation and placed all the burdens of Government upon him who had paid me every dollar he possessed in the belief that he was getting something of value.

He would see no injustice in a government of the people loaning millions through rural-credit banks, taking as security mortgages upon lands purchased from this same government, then selling securities issued against these mortgages to widows and orphans on the recommendation of this same government that the investment was safe and secure, and finally taxing the value of the real estate away, thus leaving those who had relied upon the representation and good faith of this "government of the people" to beg their bread from door to door.

Are you also color blind, or, what is worse, blind to justice and right and common national decency as between citizens of this common country?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: If the single-tax scheme is correct, then it always would have been correct. Truth is eternal. Correct governmental principles, like principles of science, never change. Perhaps it will aid you in arriving at a just conclusion as to how the scheme will work if you glance backward to see how it would have worked had it been applied when this Government was formed.

Do you think anyone would have cleared a forest, broken a piece of prairie, or planted a field knowing that he would be required to pay in taxes an amount equal to the rental value of the land he cleared? In the spring of 1869 a man who subsequently became governor of the State of Nebraska drove 90 miles to get seed corn to plant on his newly located homestead near Osceola, in that State. Twenty-seven years thereafter Nebraska harvested 350,000,000 bushels of corn. Suppose the Government had offered Mr. Mickey and other citizens each the use of 160 acres during the cropping season subject to a tax sufficient to yield all the revenues needed for the maintenance of the Government, exempting all other forms of property, from taxation, exactly as the pending single-tax scheme provides. Do you think the homestead act would have been a success? In order to make it a success the Government found it necessary to exempt these homesteads from any tax whatever for the period of five years.

Thus far in our history the American people have sought to distribute the burdens of maintenance of their Government among all classes and conditions equitably and in proportion as each has been able to pay. Admittedly, inequalities have existed. No system of taxation thus far devised has been free from human imperfections. Only single taxes lay claim to perfection. But what I want you to consider is this: Does it appeal to your sense of justice suddenly to shift the burden of government from all other forms of property and so place it upon land as to destroy the market value of all productive as well as all nonproductive real estate? The American people through their Congress and their President sold some of their lands for cash, used much of it in payment for military services in Indian wars, the War of 1812, and the Mexican War, and granted much more to homesteaders in consideration of their enduring the hardships of frontier life and improving and developing the resources of the Nation. Not many good people would now vote to confiscate these lands. But Henry George and his followers, a few of them good people, propose to do what Henry George says is the same thing, "confiscate the rent," "take the kernel and leave the shell." How does this appeal to you?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: The advocates of single tax rest their case upon the alleged fact that the confiscation of land values will result in placing unimproved lands in cultivation and insure the erection of buildings upon vacant lots.

No one knows for a certainty all that will follow in the wake of this admittedly revolutionary adventure. I once saw the following in double-leaded type on the front page of the "Great Adventure," an official organ of the single-tax adventurers:

"Single tax will put these big land values into the Public Treasury and leave the 'ground hogs' nothing to rent but the actual value of their buildings."

Everyone concedes that the single-tax scheme, if put in force, will leave the owners of real estate nothing to rent but the actual value of their buildings. It will, as Henry George says, "take the kernel and leave only the shell." It will not, however, put the present value of real estate or any part thereof into the Public Treasury. And the statement above quoted that it will do so is only one of a thousand evidences that the advocates of the measure have no just conception of what they are talking about. The present value of lands will not pass from the owner to the Public Treasury. It is only intended to put the rental value into the Treasury instead of where it belongs—to the credit of the owner. The value of the land will simply vanish. The land won't have any value. The wealth of the State will be reduced one-half or two-thirds, and the treasury of the State will remain as poor as it is now.

But how about the reclamation of idle lands? No money can be borrowed upon real estate the rental value of which goes to the State. There would be nothing left even to pay the interest, much less to redeem the mortgage. Unless you happen to know some one who is both able and willing to take a piece of unimproved land, reclaim it and cultivate it, without borrowing any money with which to irrigate and make other improvements, you are hardly justified in assuming that unimproved land will be made productive by the naked process of taxing its life out of it.

Many of you good people have seen whole States in the Central West put in cultivation and land values advance from an average of $5 an acre to fifty times, and in some instances, a hundred times $5 per acre, exclusive of buildings. But can you recall a single instance of a farm being permanently improved except with borrowed money? How many homesteaders did you know who failed to make a loan for improvements as soon as he could get his patent?

How about the man who has a mortgage on his land exceeding the value of his improvements? His land value is gone. He can't pay the mortgage. Will he stay, struggle against this debt, or will he pack up and go? Think it out for yourself and see whether the scheme will result in putting idle lands in cultivation or in multiplying the number of abandoned farms.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: In this letter I hope particularly to arrest the attention of labor.

"It is not necessary," said Henry George, "to confiscate land. It is only necessary to confiscate rent. We may safely leave the shell if we take the kernel."

The "kernel," according to Henry George's figure of speech, is the rental value of the land. This he proposes to take through taxation, instead of taking the land itself by "abolishing all private titles and declaring all lands public property." For many centuries it was said "the king can do no wrong." During the French Revolution it was said "the people can do no wrong." Both statements are as false as they are sinful. Wrongs can be committed by prince as well as by peasant. Injustice can be committed by sovereign king no less than by sovereign people. Have you ever met those who would not steal a penny or rob the richest of a dime and yet without a blush would vote to rob every landowner of every dollar he had paid for his land?

But forget the injustice and the wrong and study the question from purely a selfish angle.

Unless the single-tax scheme does take from all real estate its market value it will fail in the one thing wherein all its advocates insist it will succeed. Assume, therefore, that the proposition becomes a law, and the intended result is accomplished, and real estate ceases to have a market value. It is safe to say that every large building in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and elsewhere in the State was built in whole or in part with borrowed money, and two-thirds of them were built wholly with borrowed money. When the market value of the land is gone you will loan no money on real estate, and banks and insurance companies are no more foolish than you. Unless you happen to know of some one who has idle money that he wants to put into a building upon real estate that has no market value, you ought to be able to recognize that when land values are gone erecting buildings of every kind is at an end.

What is a building? A building, large or small, consists of iron, worth $1 per ton in the ground, plus labor, rock from the quarry, clay and sand from the pit, lumber from the forest, paint from the mineral, plus labor. Transportation is mostly labor. Every building in your State is more than 75 per cent labor. How will labor fare when building ceases?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: In this letter I want to arrest the attention of small capitalists.

The deposits of all savings banks and the resources of all life insurance companies and trust institutions belong to capitalists, mostly small capitalists. Every man and woman who has a dollar invested, whether from earnings or inheritance, is a capitalist.

Assume, if you will, that the single-tax scheme prevails, and the result promised by Henry George and boastfully reiterated in every issue of the Great Adventure follows and land values vanish. Will you loan any money on real estate that has no market value? Possibly a portion of what you have is already loaned on real estate. Will you renew that loan or will you at least attempt to collect it? Do you think the savings banks and life insurance companies, whose funds are largely loaned on real estate, are less prudent than you? Will they renew or will they also seek to collect? What will be the effect of a scramble for the collection of real estate mortgages?

Please hold the picture to your mind's eye and watch it develop. Have you any money on deposit in a savings bank which in turn has loaned it on real estate? Will you let your money stay there or will you try and get it out before others more active than you have "beaten you to it" and exhausted the convertible assets of the bank? Have you a policy in a life insurance company whose assets consist largely of real estate mortgages? Will you pay your next premium or will you seek to cash in before others more active than you have "beaten you to it" and exhausted the liquid assets of the insurance company? Do you think the world has ever seen such a panic, such a scramble, such a financial and industrial collapse as would be certain to follow the enactment of a law the avowed purpose and admitted effect of which is to strip real estate of its market value?

Have you ever observed that panics and financial depressions are no respecter of persons? They seriously affect large capitalists and small capitalists more seriously still. I am talking to small capitalists, many of whom have accumulated and are now adding thereto within the ranks of labor. By joining the single-taxers you may force some large capitalists to the wall and compel them to live on fried kittens, but while you are doing that you had better be mighty careful lest you force yourselves to eat fried cats. The American people, you must bear in mind, are kinsfolk. What helps one group helps every group. What injures one class injures every class, and the lower the class the greater the injury.

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

FELLOW CITIZEN: Please consider the following concrete instances as typical examples of the impractical effect of the single-tax scheme.

The Homestake mine is reported to have paid $60,000,000 in dividends, and ten times that sum in wages. The ore of this world-famed mine averages about $3.50 per ton. It uses every drop of available water, most of which is pumped over the mountain. Yet the mountains are full of water with no gold-bearing ore to work, and within 30 miles of the Homestake there are mountains of ore yielding over $3.50 per ton with no available water and too low in grade to bear transportation.

Now, apply the single-tax scheme to the Homestake mine, to the water that it utilizes, to the floods of unusable water, and the enormous bodies of unworkable ore. The ore beds of the Homestake stripped of the improvements—untaxable under the plan—should bear no more tax than better ore that can not be given away. The water but for the pumping plant—untaxable under the scheme—is worth no more than other streams yielding nothing taxable. Figure it out as best you can, and the Homestake mine, yielding millions in dividends, would pay no taxes under a single-tax law, while the farmers of South Dakota would have the market value of their lands taxed away to supply this loss in public revenues.

At Sierra Madre Villa, near Pasadena, Calif., there lives a man who, by tunneling some distance into the mountain, has secured a few inches of water with which he irrigates his ranch, and realizes a handsome annual return from oranges and lemons. On every side there are thousands of acres of equally good soil, but practically worthless for want of water. My friend's improvements and betterments would be exempt from taxation under the single-tax scheme, and his lands devoid of these improvements would be of no greater value than the adjacent lands, which if taxed a penny per acre would be sold for taxes.

Please apply the same principle to the railroads of the country: Tax the right of way, the same as land in the vicinity devoid of improvements, exempt the grades, cuts, culverts, bridges, ties, rails, rolling stock, and earnings, and the State would lose much revenue which the confiscated rental value of productive lands and town lots would scarcely equal.

Has the world been a fool until now? Is it now about to acquire the sum total of human wisdom with socialists, anarchists, Bolsheviki, and I. W. W. as its teachers?

Cordially, yours,

ABRAHAM ADAMS.

The Soldier of the Great War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OSCAR E. BLAND,

OF INDIANA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, it is not my purpose in what I shall say at this time to attempt to influence legislation, because that hour has passed during this session, but I do desire on this occasion to pay my respects to the valiant soldiers and sailors of the Great War and to review some of the legislation incident to same, and to point with what I believe to be pardonable pride to my labors in connection with same.

My activities in this body began with the war session on the 6th day of April, 1917, when the President of the United States called Congress in extraordinary session for the purpose of declaring war against the Imperial German Government. Our citizens had been killed while in the pursuits of peace, and our flag had been insulted on the high seas; the peace and security of our Republic had been assaulted; the liberties of mankind were threatened. A state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government was practically in existence on that eventful day. It remained for Congress to declare that that condition did exist. You may scan the pages of history of all civilization and you will find nowhere recorded a world condition similar to that which existed then. The great responsibility that came to me then came to all of you who were here, and I know you will agree with me that in those solemn hours we were all conscious of the tremendous import of the action we were to take. I voted for the declaration of war, knowing that we were about to engage in a terrible death struggle with the greatest military power known to the world; that we were unprepared; that we were a peace-loving people and knew little of the art of war.

I knew it would take much of our boasted wealth of treasure and manhood. I knew it would bring its years of anxiety, of sacrifice, of pain, and suffering. I knew that it would fasten upon the backs of generations to come the burdens of sacrifice and self-denial. I knew that it would bring its scourge of revolutionary strife and discontent. I visualized the horrors of dreadful modern warfare, and could see the maimed, the wounded, the dead, and dying, bringing with them the sobs of grief and bitter tears of anguish. Up to that hour we had never been so prosperous, so happy, so contented, so boastful of our national greatness, of our proud, enlightened, liberty-loving citizenship. Our Republic was the land of prosperity for all, the home of real freedmen and the asylum of peace and happiness for the oppressed of the world. To consciously plunge this proud, prosperous, happy people into this terrible maelstrom of hate and horror with its inevitable consequences, to my way of thinking was as great a responsibility as ever was placed upon human shoulders. It was justifiable only upon the mature and conscientious conviction, first, that the honor, safety, and very existence of the Republic itself was at stake; that the lives and happiness and prosperity and future opportunities of our citizenship depended upon the successful and victorious conclusion of the war.

Having voted to make war, I regarded it my unavoidable and indisputable duty to do all in my power in a legislative way and otherwise to make the Republic a tower of strength to the allied cause in the great crisis that had come to us. I voted for and supported in every way possible every measure and proposal demanded as necessary to the winning of the conflict. In a war where 30,000,000 men were engaged a few hundred thousand men could be of little avail, because this "struggle of the giants" meant the greatest efforts on the part of all of the combatants. If the liberties of mankind and the safety of the Republic were to be preserved, it called for mobilization not only of all our available fighting man power but of our industrial and economic wealth. I voted for the selective conscription in order that all of the available fighting man power of the Nation should be at the service of the flag if called upon.

In this way the Government went into the homes of our people and took out their dearest treasures, which in many instances left the fireside desolate and comfortless forever. The soul of the tender, gentle, loving Lincoln was racked with sorrow and pain when he was compelled to sacrifice lives of his fellow countrymen, whom he loved, in order that the country they love might not perish from the earth, and I know that the same sad sentiment was in many of your hearts that day. As a Representative of the people of the second congressional district of Indiana, and a more loyal and patriotic citizenship can be found nowhere in the Republic, I felt then and I feel now that to vote and advocate otherwise than I did would make me untrue to the trust reposed in me.

Having so voted to send the flower of American youth into the most hellish war of history, I have always felt it my duty, and I still so obligate myself, to do all in my power to add to the safety, the comfort, and the well-being of those brave men whom we took from their paths of peace and happiness and opportunity to fight the Nation's battles.

The soldiers of most European countries received but a few cents a day as pay for their services. The Civil War soldiers fought for about $13 a month. The heroes of Valley Forge and Morristown, while starving, freezing, and naked, oftentimes despaired of getting any pay at all. The recent war Congress, by almost unanimous vote, directed the payment of $30 per month for home service and additional pay while on foreign soil. We provided with equal unanimity and generosity for Government allotment and pay to the dependents of our enlisted men, also for voluntary allotments by soldier, sailor, or officer to his dependents, and for insurance to protect his loved ones in the event he fell in the conflict. The stupendous sums of money included in our appropriation bills to equip, supply, and take care of our soldiers and sailors astonished the world. Training camps, hospitals, munition plants, shipyards, docks, transports, submarines, submarine chasers, aircraft, and all the necessary paraphernalia of war had to be provided and provided quickly, while these men we had called were being examined, enrolled, and trained. The home folks were called upon to stimulate production not only of munitions and the materials of war, but wool, cotton, food, clothing, and medical supplies. To keep 4,000,000 men munitioned and comfortable, more than 3,000 miles away, called for sacrifices, called for extra effort, called for generous giving, called for the closest coordination of our hundred million people.

To successfully war against such an enemy we must put every ounce of power behind our fighting men. Disloyalty and treason must be stamped out. Clamorous, treacherous, goods-box mouthings of hirelings of the enemy must be suppressed. The black-hearted, little-souled profiteer, gloating over financial gains made in the hour of his country's travail, must be curbed. The food supply of the world was short, and we must shoulder the additional burden of feeding humanity, even if we must ration ourselves to the point of discomfort; our patriotic citizenship with astonishingly little complaint submitted to the most rigorous dieting in order that the boys at the front might have what they needed.

In the summer of 1917 a few thousand of our men landed on foreign soil. The allied morale was low, and the enemy saw victory in the near future. The landing of this handful of soldiers gave new hope to the allied cause. In July, 1918, after the rush of legislation was over, I felt it my duty to go on my own responsibility to the battle front, to the billets, to the ports and docks, to the hospitals, and the American military activities in France, in order that I might get first-hand information and, by better knowing and understanding the conditions under which our boys lived over there, be better enabled to intelligently legislate for their needs. I shall not soon forget the dark, foggy night of June 29, 1918, when a small, dark passenger vessel crept out of New York Harbor loaded with civilians, American troops, and a few companies of Paderewski's Poles. The waters on both shores were infested with submarines, and this little vessel, without convoy, started across the dark, dangerous, and forbidding ocean, which each day was the savage scene of the greatest tragedies of history. On this vessel I met and talked with many soldiers, and among them was a strong-hearted lad from the second Indiana congressional district. We zigzagged for 13 days without convoy across the pathless waves with a broken-down engine, with lifeboats of doubtful value, and with a crew unfamiliar with submarine activities. Did these dangers and terrors and hardships trouble the hearts of these reckless, daring young Americans who from necessity were uncomfortably quartered and none too well provided with food? I never heard an expression of fear or desire to turn back. Every one of them expressed anxiety to get into the conflict, and I really believe most of them would have hailed with joy the sight of a submarine periscope. Some of our brave boys found a watery grave and were lost beneath these cruel waters, but thank Heaven most of them who embarked landed on foreign soil and rendered a splendid account of themselves.

On March 21, 1918, the Central Powers had started their great "peace drive" on the western front. Never before in the history of warfare was such a mass of men and munitions assembled as the enemy hurled at the tired and discouraged allies. The Kaiser believed that this was the beginning of the end, and Haig soon said that his back was to the wall; the whole world shuddered at the terrible carnage and what seemed to be the certain result; the heart of civilization was broken. I was in Paris on July 14, 1918, which is the French Fourth of July. July 14 and 15, 1918, will be cherished forever as the days when the heroism and courage of the soldier of the New World saved the liberties of the Old by checking the triumphant but methodical advance of the great army of the Central Powers against Paris, which up to this time had been invincible. The mettle of the fighting Yank had already been tested, and he was the hero of the day. The many-colored uniforms from almost every country of the world marched in that great parade. I looked with admiration upon the tired and worn poilu of France, the weary but unconquerable Tommy of England, the turbaned Singalese and Indian soldier, the kilted Scotch, the fearless Irish, the unyielding Canadian, and even the stolid Russian and the fiery Italian was in the line. They had been sobered by conflict, by death and horror, and had proudly sustained the best traditions of their countries. But my heart swelled with pride and tears came to my eyes when I saw the tinpan helmets over the jaunty, smiling faces of the reckless, daring Yanks as they electrified that great city in their march across the Place de Concorde. I knew that soon they were to be tested in the crucible. The powerful German guns could be heard in Paris that day. Within a few weeks the Kaiser hoped he would occupy this beautiful city of art, and his enemies, disheartened, would yield to subjugation.

I went out to general headquarters, to the training areas, to the billets, to the hospitals. I went up into the Vosges Mountains, where our boys were holding the line, and in the sectors at Toul and Nancy. I visited the air squadrons, prison camps, aeroplane assembling plants, ports, docks, and the varied military activities. Already the khaki uniform of the Yanks and the roaring motor of the military truck and automobile engaged in our preparation for the great day were in evidence practically all over France. America's big way of doing things had created open-mouthed astonishment in that splendid little Republic.

I was at Chaumont when Foch's great offensive at Chateau-Thierry was started on the 18th day of June, 1918. Upon my return to Paris, I visited our evacuation hospitals. Thousands of American soldiers, many of them literally shot to pieces, and some of them severely gassed, were being brought to these institutions for temporary treatment. I said then that the history of the future world was being written on the battle fields near at hand. I was the first civilian in Chateau-Thierry after the Boche were driven out. I visited the scenes of our first great sacrifice, where whole regiments were almost completely annihilated, but where the word "retreat" or "surrender" was never known. I heard first-hand there amidst the terrible wreck of recent battle the story of the attack, of the charge, of the withering machine-gun fire, of the terrible death struggle, of the unflinching suffering and courage, of the uncomplaining, furious, reckless, dashing gallantry in open warfare that the Europeans up to this hour had not known. I visited the village of Vaux, where American skill and daring and ingenuity, without the loss of a life, had captured a village considered as impregnable. I looked with glowing pride upon the Blue Woods of Belleau, where the enemy in entrenched insolence regarded his position as unassailable; I stood in the Surmelin Valley, near the Marne, where the Thirty-eighth Infantry stopped the German hoard, saved Paris, and saved the world, and earned the title "The Rock of the Marne." The enemy dead had not been buried, and shell and shot had left their withering blight, but there not many hours before the future of the world had been changed. A few miles away from the city of Chateau-Thierry our brave lads were still throwing themselves at the enemy without regard to consequences and the enemy had realized that a new force, a new power, a new spirit, was in front of him and was turning his back to the advancing tide in khaki uniform, never again to threaten the happiness and peace of civilization.

In this great drive Indiana played a proud part. Col. Adams, of Vincennes, was second in command in the Rock of the Marne Regiment and helped to withstand the terrible fury of the attack and routed three divisions of Germany's best soldiery. Some of the second district boys were in the First, Second, Forty-second, and Twenty-sixth Divisions, and I think other divisions containing Indiana boys shared in the glory of the wonderful victories of the second Marne campaign.

Col. Tyndall commanded the Field Artillery brigade, in which were many young men from the second congressional district, who were as fine soldiers as the world has ever produced. They belonged to the Forty-second Division. Up to this time they had already earned a proud record. I knew most of these boys, many of them came from the colleges and the busy business life of the second congressional district. Some of their comrades had been wounded when I visited them. They were going into the fight again the next day. Within a few days they had lost several of their comrades, but they saw no rest until the fighting was over. The unyielding courage, intelligence, and tenacity of this wonderful division of National Guards will never be forgotten. Many times afterwards before Armistice Day their well-tried, well-known courage and intrepidity as soldiers were called into use in driving the Hun out of France.

In the summer of 1919 it became my duty to visit these battle scenes in an official capacity. I again went over the scenes where our brave men had turned the German horde in the great Soissons, Chateau-Thierry, Rheims drive. No American can visit this scene and study the struggle that there took place without feeling his bosom swelling with pride because of the heroism displayed there by our splendid and gallant fighting men. I visited the cemeteries at Belleau, at Surrennes, at Romaine. I followed the line of battle and the triumphant advance of the Yanks through the forest of the Argonne, Montrebeau Wood, Madelain Farm, Hill 223, Montfaucon, and the hundred other blood-stained places in this greatest field of human conflict known in the history of civilization. From the heights of Hattonchatel I looked down into the valley where the great St. Mihiel offensive was won. I visited the scene of conflict around Verdun. I followed the Hindenburg line for more than a hundred miles. I studied and examined these well-prepared barriers, which the enemy regarded as impregnable, against which all hope of civilization might battle in vain. I saw where these twentieth century monsters of defense had resisted in vain, and I said then, and I say now, that no power in this world save the intrepid, dauntless courage, hope, and inspiration of the manhood of the New World could ever have gone over those defenses.

I saw where they had been pushed aside like the drifting sands of the seashore; I saw where the enemy in consternation and panic had been forced to leave their shelter and withdraw in haste; I saw there then why it was that early in November the enemy sued for peace, and the most horrible and devastating human conflict of history was ended.

Our Nation grieves because of the fact that 75,000 of our brave boys sleep beneath foreign soil and that hundreds of thousands of them will go through life maimed and halt, and that many hundreds of thousands of them have been weakened in body and spirit on account of the extraordinary hardships and exposure to which they were subjected. I am told that 10,000 of our boys who participated in this struggle are permanently insane and more than 100,000 were discharged with mental disability. Six hundred thousand men have been damaged in body or mind on account of their participation in this great struggle. You speak of the hell of war in France. If you have visited some of the training camps in America you will conclude that they were not pleasure resorts, to say the least. Where thousands of men were crowded together in the mud and rain and cold and inconvenience of unnatural surroundings in military training camps, suffering, pain, and disease must necessarily and unavoidably be present. Many of these 4,000,000 men called from their happy homes are permanently out of the battle of civil life by reason of their service for their country, regardless of whether they were on the fighting front or not. Now, my friends, add to the total number of insane and wounded and disabled by disease and sickness the dependents of those that were killed and disabled, and you will arrive at an enormous total of responsibility that this Nation must shoulder in the future.

When these boys marched away from their home towns and cities, when they were loaded on the trains for training camps, and when they were embarked from the ports of the United States, a full-hearted, patriotic citizenship, realizing the sacrifices these lads were making and were liable to make, bade them Godspeed and pledged them their devotion through life. "You go on, John, and fight for your country; we will back you up, and we will see that you and yours do not suffer." John did the fighting and he did it well; he did it better than we did backing him up. He lost two years of the best part of his young life.

When the war broke out the golden apple of opportunity hung low on the bough for his grasping. When he returned the walks of civilian life were new to him. His job, if he had one, oftimes was gone. His allotment and insurance most frequently had taken all of his pay. Hundreds of thousand of them did not have money enough to buy a new suit of clothes. We had spent $28,000,000,000 and loaned the Allies ten billions. We had passed revenue laws to raise this money, which put a heavy burden upon the taxpayer. The war was over, the country was saved, and some of the taxpayers began to complain. I am afraid that some of our people who longed for peace began to forget what peace had cost. I am told that the officers of the "Rock of the Marne regiment"—using this for an example—were met at the port at Hoboken and informed that they had been reduced in rank and therefore their pay was reduced. Congress hastened to give each discharged soldier two months' pay in order that he might buy a suit of clothes. While this was generous, in a way, it was a pitiful acknowledgment of the obligation that we owe to these boys who, while we were secure at home, faced hell a thousand times in a thousand ways.

Since I have been in Congress, among my several committee assignments, I have been on the Invalid Pension Committee of the House of Representatives. Before I came here I pledged my constituents that I would stand for and ardently advocate better treatment to all brave men who helped to defend our flag. I was joint author of the Smoot-Bland bill—the Invalid Pension Committee only considers pensions arising from Civil War—which gave a minimum pension of $30 and a maximum of $40 a month, and I helped to frame and report to Congress and voted and spoke for the Fuller bill, which gives a maximum of $50 and gives $72 to the totally disabled. I supported and worked for the Sells bill, which is a service bill for Spanish War Veterans. I helped to increase the pensions of soldiers' widows, orphans, and dependants. I have been criticized for my liberal view on pensions to discharged soldiers, but I have stated publicly in my district and on the floor of Congress, and I again state, that I have no apologies to make for such liberality as I have shown in taking money out of the Federal Treasury to pay the defenders of our flag.

I understand and fully appreciate that the matter could be carried too far, but as long as I am a Representative in the Federal legislative body I shall steadfastly advocate and fight for, to the utmost of my ability, a proper and adequate compensation and help for the men who have made it possible for this Republic to exist with its present wealth and power and glory. A nation that will exact the life of its citizens to defend it in an hour of peril and then desert them or fail to render them full justice after the successful conflict is ended is unworthy of existence. Had these 4,000,000 men stayed at home, the talents of Congress would have been busily exercised at this hour devising means to pay indemnity to the Central Powers. It is frequently stated—and I think to the everlasting shame of the Republic—that a financial recognition of the lost opportunities of these 4,000,000 men at this time is commercializing patriotism. I voted for the recent compensation-adjustment bill because it, in part and only in a small way, attempted to equalize the opportunity of the men who were called into the service and those who were not called.

This Congress has done much for the discharged soldier in starting him out again in the avenues of civil life, and I am proud of the fact that I have supported heartily every measure intended to be helpful to him in this connection. For those that were disabled in service we have provided for vocational training. Hundreds of thousands of them can never again take up the work they laid down when the bugle call to duty was sounded. New fields of effort must be found, and this Congress has appropriated $130,000,000 for that purpose. More than a hundred thousand disabled men would be hopeless but for the benefits of this beneficent law. We have enacted into law a statute giving them the opportunity of qualifying themselves for trades and professions at which they can earn a livelihood in the future rather than be solely dependent upon the generosity of their country. The Nation, if it considered the financial question alone and as a business proposition, would exercise poor judgment if it failed to rehabilitate into fields of permanent usefulness the physical wrecks of this Great War. But I am glad to say that Congress in its extraordinary generosity in its legislation and appropriations for vocational training has had a higher motive than the economic gain that would come to it by making these unfortunate men self-sustaining, or nearly so.

Congress in passing this legislation believed that the country owed the disabled soldier the duty of helping him to be an independent, useful, self-respecting citizen; that his happiness and the happiness of those who were dear to him depended much upon what he did with himself as the years go on. His happiness much depends upon his consciousness of ability to help himself.

This one act on the part of Congress and the study that grew out of it brought about other legislation later in the session just closed which, to my way of thinking, is one of the most advanced and highly commendable pieces of legislation enacted since civilization began. It is now written upon the statute books that the Federal Government shall help the States reclaim and rehabilitate at public expense all those unfortunates who are injured in the various industrial walks of life. The coal miner, the railroader, the shop worker, and those who toil in various places of industry in the Nation are now given to understand that if they are so unfortunate as to become maimed or injured so as to no longer be able successfully, comfortably, and profitably to pursue their usual avocations, they may have the opportunity at public expense to learn a new trade, a new profession, a new work in which they may engage successfully. It is holding out hope to the helpless. It offers comfort not only to the toiler but to those who are dear to him and dependent upon him; it is not only humane and in harmony with the best spirit of the twentieth century but it is, in my judgment, from an economic standpoint, good business.

The world had not been thinking much along these lines until the problem came to us out of this Great War, and if I had time I would like to pick out many examples of where we have profited in many ways by our experience in this great struggle. Sad and terrible as it is to contemplate the tremendous loss of things held dear by humanity, there has come to us in these hours of bitterness new ideas, new hopes, new obligations, and new consecration to duty.

I voted for the bill which gives the ex-service man the opportunity of acquiring a home and of acquiring cheap but unquestionable insurance. This Congress has given him the preference in certain fields of Government service. We have amended the war-risk insurance act, increasing the allowance in certain classes of serious injury. The Sweet bill, which we passed, amends the war-risk insurance act with a view to increasing the efficiency of the law and greatly liberalizes the provisions of the act in the payment of compensation to disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. We authorized by law the incorporation of the American Legion in order that the heroes of this war might band themselves together with ties of love and sympathy. This wonderful organization of the best blood in the American Republic, in my judgment, is to occupy a proud position in the affairs of the Nation. Not only will they keep green the graves of those who have fallen and who will fall by the wayside in life's struggle, but they will, by their united efforts and by their courageous and manly conduct and by precept and example, preserve the foundations of the Republic, foster love of country, instill reverence for the flag, and keep our people constantly in mind of the arduous duties of citizenship.

As I stated before, I dedicated my services in Congress largely to redeeming the pledge of the Nation to these splendid men. I have tried to keep the faith. I have in my files many thousands of letters from young soldiers in my district. I have helped them get their $60 bonus and their clothing allowance and their travel pay. I have fought out many of their cases with the War Risk Insurance Bureau in adjusting their claims and allowances and allotments. I have kept in close touch with the Vocational Board and have helped many boys from the second district to secure vocational training. I have helped to relieve the distress of hundreds of parents and relatives by keeping the lines of communication open between them and their soldier boys abroad.

During the war, Congress, the Secretary of War, and other high officials promised the distressed parents of boys who were going to the battle fields that should they fall in the fray their remains should be returned to them, if they so desired. Seventy per cent of the parents of the 75,000 soldiers who sleep in foreign soil indicated their wish that the remains of their loved ones be returned to them at Government cost. I introduced the first bill providing adequate means for accomplishing this purpose and made the first speech on the floor of the House on the subject. I caused hearings to be had before the Foreign Affairs Committee, which brought about the crystallization of sentiment that resulted in the War Department getting at the job in earnest, and I am hopeful that this great and humane undertaking may soon be finished.

My investigations in an official capacity with reference to the conduct of this war has brought me to the unavoidable conclusion that in any war of the magnitude of the Great War there will necessarily be many inequalities of law and many unjust applications of it and many mistakes, all of which may be remedied, cured, or perfected to such an extent that the mischief done may not be repeated in the future. Our court-martial laws which have been on the statute books for many years, in my judgment, have not been conducive to giving the enlisted man full justice or a square deal. The old system resulted in unjust and excessive penalties and fostered in the Army a spirit of harshness, cruelty, and revenge that was not conducive to the best Army morale. In some of the prisons in the American Expeditionary Forces, some of our boys—many of them innocent of wrongdoing—were badly treated, and I have thousands of letters from them from all over the United States demanding that these conditions be remedied and that those responsible for this misconduct be called to account.

The United States is the one Nation engaged in this Great War that I know of that did not open its civil prison doors for the purpose of recruiting prisoner-soldiers. We demanded that our Army be made up of the best citizenship of the Nation. It is not fair to say that a boy who was arrested for "A. W. O. L." is "a skulker, a criminal, a thug," and so forth. I believe the investigations made and the publicity given has already had a wonderful effect. The new Army bill provides for radical changes in the old law which, in my judgment, will make our military statutes better fitted to the needs and requirements of a great citizen army in event we are ever called upon again to mobilize one.

My colleagues, this Republic owes a great debt of gratitude to these splendid men who were the Nation's bulwark in the hour of our national peril. We must not forget their heroic service. Our prosperous, generous, patriotic citizenship must not only keep green the graves of the brave souls who fell in the strife but we must care for their loved ones; we must also care for his unfortunate comrades, who suffered with him, but who, I am grateful to know, remain with us and who are at this hour the special pride of the Nation.

The Mason Resolution and the Loyal Coalition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES A. GALLIVAN,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, at 4 o'clock this afternoon the second session of this the Sixty-sixth Congress will see its finish. Congress is not adjourning with its work all done, mark you, but the majority leaders have heard some one calling them to hurry to Chicago for Tuesday next, when the national Republican convention opens its sessions, and the first inning of the national game of big-league politics will be played.

No man in this House will say that this Congress has half completed the work allotted to it. I have neither the time nor the inclination to analyze in this speech the failures of the Republican leaders of this House. I have one piece of proposed legislation in mind, properly presented to this body, widely advertised, and nationally approved, agreed to by a majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs after long and intensive study, which, we are now officially informed, will not be considered before final adjournment. I refer to the so-called Mason resolution expressing the sympathy of the Congress with the aspirations of the people of the young republic of Ireland to govern themselves without outside interference of any kind or character.

I am informed from most authoritative sources that the Republican leaders of this body have reached a secret agreement whereby the membership of the House will not be permitted to record itself on this question of recognizing the young Irish republic by extending a word of hope and sympathy. In the language of its author, the Mason resolution has been chloroformed, and we must go back to our districts and tell our people bluntly and in strict adherence to the truth that the Republicans in control of this House have denied us the right to vote on this message of cheer to young Ireland, and that they have brazenly entered into a secret agreement with the Speaker of this body not to call up the Mason resolution and to prevent anyone else from calling it up.

Mr. Speaker, you have the right to do as you are doing under the rules of this House, but you ought to have told this House before this day what is your reason for refusing to recognize the friends of Ireland's aspirations who have tried to get consideration for the Mason resolution. As the spokesman for the Republican Party in this House, by your action you are strangling a mild resolution of sympathy and encouragement whose passage would have heartened not only the patriots and the peasants of the Irish republic but would also have enthused and rejoiced the 20,000,000 Americans, Irish by blood or by birth, whose first love is America, but who never can and never should forget the land where they were born or where their fathers died.

My interest in self-government for Ireland is the interest of an American Congressman and an American citizen. I am sick and disgusted at hearing some people say that when the Irish people agree on what they want England will grant it to them. You forget, Mr. Speaker, that if that principle had been applied to us this Nation would never have existed. The constant repetition of this anti-Irish propaganda suggests to me an outstanding fact which I want to call to your attention, and I ask you to note carefully my statement.

In the election of December, 1918, England had nine political groups which returned members to Parliament. These were:

(1) Coalition Unionists.
(2) Coalition Liberalists.
(3) Coalition Laborites.
(4) Unionists.
(5) Asquithian Liberals.
(6) Laborites.
(7) National Party.
(8) Independents.
(9) Socialists.

The Irish people in the same election had only three groups:

(1) Sinn Fein Republicans.
(2) Dillon Nationals.
(3) Pro-English Unionists.

The Sinn Fein party captured 72 per cent of the country in that election, and in more recent elections it has captured other portions of the county and municipal governments which had been hitherto claimed by the Unionists. Those who do not know the truth but are willing to learn can judge from these figures whether or not the people of Ireland are divided.

Let me say to this House that the Republican leaders can not excuse their cowardly dodging of this question of self-government for the Irish people by any such pretext as the foregoing. I am inclined to the belief that they have been persuaded to their hostile action by such narrow-minded, bigoted, provincial, Tory-hearted organizations as the "Loyal Coalition," of Boston, and their kindred societies of other cities. And I want to take this opportunity to pay my respects to the crowd in my own city who have recently publicly assailed my activity in favor of the Mason resolution and in behalf of the thousands of Irish political prisoners now held in British jails.

The "Loyal Coalition," of Boston, is distinctly a treasonable, secret, anti-American body of American and provincial Tories, Britishers of a sort, and other alien-minded conspirators, officered by some cranks and a few criminals, and financed by anti-American sources. Its membership in many instances has been recruited from the wrecks and remnants of exploded and shattered society of discredited bigotry and social treason. It is a body set up to aid the stealthy activities of the British secret service, to promote British interests at the expense of American honor and security, and, by assailing the American Irish and their race, religion, and political hopes, to obtain allies among the baser elements of society and injure America by fostering religious strife and civil dissension.

The telegram of this venal, immoral, and impudent alien agency to me and other public men is an insult, just as its presence on our soil is a public danger, calling for police activity and sanitary vigilance. The cousin and agent of Lloyd-George, who signs himself president of this alien political polecat, is the brother of the notorious, anti-Christian red arrested the other day in Chicago as a public enemy; he appears to lack his inflammatory relative's courage. Anyone who will take the trouble to examine the criminal archives of Suffolk County, in my State, will come across some evidences bearing on the character and patriotism of the treasurer of this smelly concern. Of such is the "Loyal Coalition," of Boston.

Decent citizens have only contempt for the enemies of American liberty and civil religious peace. I favor treating them as their spiritual ancestors were treated in 1783. Boat them across the Bay of Fundy or ship them in the first boat going east to Halifax or Sheol.

As long as I sit in Congress I shall consider it my sacred duty to do all in my power to bring to fruition the hopes of every race and nationality struggling for freedom and self-government. In so doing my conduct will be in harmony with the noblest traditions of America and the sentiments and utterances of her great sons. Only those who have lost their Americanism, who forget the history of their country, who ignore or becloud the splendid services given to America in every crisis of her life by Ireland and the Irish, are unable to know that the fight of Ireland in 1920 and America in 1776 are similar. The demands of the Irish in 1920 may be read word for word in the Bill of Rights written into the constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and those who seek to deny Irish claims against English misgovernment, whether they do it anonymously in the press or stealthily or by indirection, like this wretched "Loyal Coalition," are faithless to America, false to the teachings of the fathers and founders of this Republic, and unfit to fellowship with Americans who love their country and its flag, and the traditions, the liberty, the humanity its name connotes.

As for this malodorous pest that dares insult me and other public men with its British-financed and British-inspired insolences, it should be taken in tongs and dropped into the nearest sewer, where it can foregather with the other foul and noxious things the sanitary authorities ban from polluting our cities. Pests of this kind should be driven out; they stink in the nostrils of the country; and the Department of Justice should no longer permit these aggregations of grafters, traitors, and agents provocateur to endanger the social and religious peace of any American community.

I hope from my heart that it is not true, as this gang now boasts, the Republican leaders of this House have hearkened to their treacherous and dark-lantern attacks.

Let us not be unmindful, Mr. Speaker, of the circumstances of the birth of our own Nation. We ought now to reassert in this Congress the principle that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

We ought now to deny the right of strong nations to enslave the weak and to make them subject to their interests. Because America has always stood for justice, we ought here and now to offer our traditional sympathy to all nations, such as Ireland, struggling to be free.

You can not drive the Irish problem out of the politics of America or of the world, struggle as you may. To paraphrase the great Irish-Virginian, Patrick Henry, whose fiery eloquence first lighted the torch of independence, "The Irish have but one lamp by which their feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. They know no way of judging the future but by the past." Judging by the past they know that there is nothing in the conduct of the British ministry to justify the hope of any Irishman that England will do justice to Ireland unless the moral force of the world looms up more powerful and compelling than British armored dreadnought or standing army.

Let us hope, my colleagues, that the "square deal" has not been buried with Theodore Roosevelt.

White Coal.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D. SCHALL,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, May 4, 1920,

On the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, to repeal section 18 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes," and for other purposes.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, the history of civilization is the history of man's conquest of the forces of nature. An old legend tells of the three giants who in turn have toiled for man. First was Wind, a mighty fellow, but willful, who turned man's windmills and drove his boats when he listed. But Wind was not a steady laborer, and man turned to Water to aid him. Water then turned his millwheels and carried his loads. But Water could not climb hills nor leave his accustomed runway. So man, ever more pressing in his demands, learned at length of the mighty giant, Steam, near kin to Water, and mightiest of the three, always to be depended on and almost limitless in his capabilities. Had the story been cast in these days a fourth giant would have been added, near kin to Water and to Steam, and his name might have been called White Coal, the mystic, unfathomed, wondrous electricity, liberated from the power of water.

What is power in terms of modern life? It moves the wheels of every industry. Power lights our houses, hauls our vehicles on river, rail, and streets; cooks our food; harvests our grain; grinds our flour; hews the stones for our great buildings and hoists them and the mighty steel girders into place. Power lifts our elevators, carries our messages over the wires, weaves our garments, contrives everything we wear from our shoes to the buttons on our caps. Power is the warp and woof of our modern existence. The man or group of men who own power will own the people of the United States. Our coal supply is nearing its end. Our oil supply is not eternal. The very cordage in our forests is measured, and that remnant is annually gnawed at by forest fires. There remains to us in plentitude but water. The water power of the country has been variously estimated at from 60,000,000 to 700,000,000 horsepower—a stupendous thought coupled with the fact that in the not very far distant future electricity will be the universal motive power of our industrial life. Electric power is the cheapest, cleanest, surest, most all-around and indifferent-to-weather power that there is. In Rocky Mountain severest winter weather electric locomotives run when steam engines freeze. The Scientific American says that the substitution of 50,000,000 water power for steam would release 7,000,000 freight cars, avoid the mining of 275,000,000 tons of fuel, and release the services of 300,000 coal miners.

It is not any wonder that the hydroelectric people made such titanic efforts to get a bill through as quickly and quietly as possible that would take from the people the ownership and control of the water power of the United States.

Each time the House and Senate conferees have come to grips the House has stood firm against ceding the rights of the people. In consequence there has always been a deadlock among the conferees. The Senate has persistently held that rights to water-power sites should be granted by the Secretary of War. The House took the position that this privilege should be vested in Congress. The Senate at first stood for no charge to holding companies. The Senate has heretofore favored a recapture clause at variance with the interests of the public. And on the part of those favoring the water-power interests in both Houses there has been a tendency to try and crowd this bill into the log jam of legislation during the closing days of a session, when there has not been sufficient time for discussion or examination of its provisions. This is a technical subject, worthy of being presented with care and particularity.

It is a striking fact that in the 10 years' history of this legislation very little publicity attended the discussion of the water-power legislation. A long grizzly arm was reaching out to the most gigantic grab this selfish old world has ever seen, and there was scarcely a ripple on the surface of the magazines. Only glittering generalities. They did not want any publicity on the particulars of this legislation, and they said so. But an enormous propaganda, with millions of dollars behind it, sent articles broadcast to foster the idea that it was the fault of Congress that millions of cheap water power were running to waste and that thriving industries were being throttled. "Conservation," their chief propagandist was wont to say, "means saving from waste. Every horsepower of water power therefore which remains undeveloped is a waste that can not be recouped." This Uriah Heep legislation came rubbing its hands under the guise of a plan to save all that immensely valuable water power to the people that is now running wantonly to waste, going into eternity forever without possibility of recapture. It really intended the perpetual subjugation of the American people, because it purposed putting the power of navigable streams into the hands of a few private capitalists and their successors forever. Just a few more gigantic fortunes above, a greater depth of misery below. The beginning of universal monopoly. President Wilson used to say, "It is better to let the water power run to waste than to settle it in the wrong way." The plan of the interests backing this legislation is to put at naught the work of the conservationists.

Part of the efforts of the propagandists is exerted toward clouding the existence of the Hydroelectric Trust. The Electrical World is the chief exorcist. February 5, 1916, it says editorially:

The Government is once more obsessed with the idea that there is a water-power trust. We thought it was definitely proved to the Senate committee in December, 1914, that there was no such monopoly, but apparently the ghost will not down.

Even in a periodical of the apparent virtue of the Outlook there appeared in February, 1916, an article favoring the very measure that Theodore Roosevelt named "an iniquity," which ended, "Why not pass the bill?" Some of their spokesmen are saying openly and sneeringly that "the word of Gifford Pinchot and the old conservationist propaganda are now discredited." Again, in March, 1920, a writer in the Electrical World complains indignantly of—cranks who opposed water-power legislation on the silly and erroneous theory that there was a water-power trust in our country that was trying to grab up all of the water powers and develop them entirely in its own interests. It is only one case among many where a small, well-organized minority has been able to bamboozle a great majority and make the latter suffer widespread financial loss.

Those are the kind of weasel words that make me fear this bill. We have had too many such the last few years. This bill has eliminated some of the most outrageous features of former bills. It provides, apparently, for safe recapture. It reserves to the United States the right to amend and repeal. It apparently provides for preference to a public corporation over a private or commercial corporation as lessee, though there is a loophole in the wording of the section. The matter of charge is objectionable. There should have been a tax of at least $5 per horsepower. This on 60,000,000 horsepower would have bought the plants in 25 years, and they could then have been turned over to the people.

The sinister fact is that the Hydroelectric Trust is at such pains to deny its own existence. The whole country is divided into zones. It is fairly well ascertained what parts have been apportioned to what divisions of the General Electric Co. The Pacific Electric & Gas Co. is its name in California. The Southern Power Co. has five States. The Stone & Webster Co. is the Northwestern member. Who do you think had the money and the time and the patience to build these wonders of engineering that are illustrated in the scientific papers—these marvelous dams and spillways, standing silent, waiting for an enabling act from Congress to set the stream of gold flowing from the liberated water powers? The Hydroelectric Trust may have some great scheme in mind to benefit humanity, but there is no way of judging the future but by the past and what has there been in the past of the Beef Trust, the Oil Trust, the Coal Trust, the present Food Trust, to warrant our confidence that a further iron ring around our sole remaining inheritance would bring us relief? Monopoly in the past has not tended to reduce the high cost of living. Their talk of cheap power is alluring, only it would cease to be cheap the moment they have it in their avaricious grasp. It is latent evil, evil precedent, that makes me fear this bill. The water-power interests have been quietly agglomerating all the riparian rights they could get their hands on. This accomplished, they are indifferent as to the provisions of the enabling act.

We have within very recent years an example of what we may expect in the way of cheap rates from these philanthropic water-power companies. You remember the House recently had under consideration a bill in the interests of two companies at Niagara Falls, to permit the Secretary of War to hand over for 50 years water-power rights we acquired by treaty from Canada—not a bill to regulate them, but to endow them with rights they had been enjoying for some time, and give them 4,400 feet more. Twenty years ago the State of New York granted them the privilege of diverting the water of Niagara without paying for it. Everything they wanted the State of New York granted them. Every law framed since has protected these companies and prevented any competing companies from getting started. And what has this so carefully fostered pair done toward effecting cheap power in return for such paternal care? The use they have made of their privileges should be an object lesson. Just across the river the Canadian companies, private companies, have a rate of $9 per horsepower, with a large profit. The American companies sell for $20 up to $200 per horsepower. This bill to make a legal right of a privilege that was in its beginning a usurpation is all a part of the gigantic scheme of the Hydroelectric Trust.

No Hydroelectric Trust! It is hard to understand a state of mind that expects the people to swallow such a statement. But greed for gold is paralyzing to the intellect. It is preparing a national peril, a disaster that will inevitably engulf itself and all connected with it if it is allowed to go unchecked. Here we are, a people favored of all nations in natural resources. We had every opportunity to build up a nation where, as its founders hoped, a government of the people, by the people, and for the people should not perish from the earth. But rapacity is gouging and crowding. Human nature will not endure it forever. History tells what human nature goaded to desperation will do. A social revolution is inevitable if the grabbers of wealth and privilege do not permit their prudence to dictate to their greed. The I. W. W.'s are a symptom and evidence of the unrest of the times. Revolutions do not come in a day. There was many an act of madness before the barons rose in their might at Runnymede; years of abuse before the yeomen in their turn revolted against the heavy yoke of the barons. Mountains of cruelty and injustice preceded the grim counting of the knitting women at the guillotine.

Nero, the Roman tyrant, wished that the people of Rome had but one head, that he might chop off all at one fell swoop. When the great intellects of the business world have rounded all the diversified interests up into one vast unit under one control, there is this consoling thought, that if they manifest too-atrocious greed the Government will have a simpler operation to set us free.

The Budget.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD YATES,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I can not support the motion to pass the new so-called budget bill. I can not vote for this budget bill. I was not for it and did not vote for it when it passed the House or when the motion was debated to concur in the report of the conference committee after the House and Senate disagreed and appointed conferees. I was against it when it first came up, because, in the first place, it created a powerful and high-salaried Government official who could remain in his powerful and high-salaried office until the age of 70 unless sooner removed by both Houses of Congress. This might mean an official appointed at the age of 25 and serving 45 years. I have never seen a man who had been in an appointive office 45 years but once. He was a State appointee, and was the most insolent, arrogant, self-important, and altogether incompetent person I ever saw or heard. I thanked God when a new governor took him by the collar and fired him without hesitation or benefit of clergy. He had bragged in my presence that no governor, whether Republican or Democrat, would think of removing him, because he had been in office 40 years. So I knew, when this bill appeared and was read, that it provided for the erection of a sacred, sanctified, uncontaminated official, in whose anteroom for 40 years all comers, and Congressmen in particular, would have to sit, hand in hand, cooling their heels, in order to get any kind of an appropriation favorably considered. The bill, as originally passed, did provide that this monster, this Frankenstein, this creation of ours, clothed with power to throttle us, could be dismissed before his seventieth year if a majority in each House voted to expel him. There was that little leeway, that much of a sugar-coating to the bill. But it still looked to me like a life job for a minor appointee. Now, here, to-day, we have in this new bill a provision that the President may appoint this man, this man of possibly 21, to serve possibly 49 years—through his seventieth year.

I can not understand how any man seeking to have and make a check upon the President, a curb upon the executive officers, can favor this bill as it now stands. When the proposed amendment, now embodied in the bill, struck out the clause giving Congress power to remove, and gave power to the President to both appoint and remove, the 70-year clause ought to have been stricken out, too. But no; if I vote for this bill, I vote for a life-long job holder to be appointed by the President, and in a bill designed to appoint a man to watch and curb the President. A confusing consummation, certainly.

Of course I do not think any Democrat is to blame for supporting this bill. You see, he will gladly vote for it, because it enables him to lay the blame at the door of a bad system instead of the extravagant, wildly extravagant, Democratic appointees.

But there is another reason for voting against this bill. The confusion characterizing the inconsistent clause just referred to characterizes this whole thing. All this mass of budget legislation which we have been listening to is founded on a good deal of bunk—just plain buncombe.

For example, I know what happened in Illinois. I know Illinois; know all about Illinois. There is no magic in the word "budget" in Illinois. No miracle has happened in Illinois. True, one of the nine cabinet officers—created by the consolidating act called the code—is a director of finance, who has under him an appointee who is a budget clerk. It is true that if the cabinet officer called director of health wants a given appropriation for any one of the 10 bureaus under his department he must go and fight it out with the director of finance before he makes his appeal before the house and senate appropriation committees of the legislature. That is probably a good thing, if there is not ability or application or firmness enough in the governor's office to keep appropriations down. But the budget closet or counter is only a small subordinate part of the finance director's work or job.

No budget director in Illinois serving 40 years. No, indeed; a man serving during the executive's pleasure—that is, "during good behavior." Here is what happened in Illinois: Harmony happened—harmony with a club! A hundred or a hundred and twenty-five commissions were apparently abolished, but there are as many jobs as before or I am misinformed. For instance, take the State Public Utilities Commission. Under Gov. Dunne it cost $300,000 a year; $600,000 in the biennal; now it costs over $700,000 in the biennal. There are as many commissions as ever, more employees, a longer pay roll, and an overhead addition—a director of trade and commerce, at $7,000 a year, with a force drawing about $50,000 a year in salaries and supplies. I know something about the utilities commission because I was the Republican member of it from its inception under Gov. Dunne, in 1913, until Gov. Lowden came in in 1917. It was not the budget which reorganized Illinois. It was the consolidating act. The code, this act, simply took every commission and put it under a cabinet officer, abolishing a few as it went along, but substituting "advisory boards," so that the list of appointees is just as long or longer. I am not criticizing or complaining. It may prove a good thing. I hope it will. I only wish I had had a legislature when I was governor willing to do this consolidating. Some day we will pass a national consolidating act, and it will be a good thing. But this budget bill will not abolish any one board or commission that I know of.

Another funny thing: Some more misunderstanding and misapprehension. Gov. Lowden testified before the Budget Committee—our congressional Budget Committee. He testified, in the main, in behalf of his consolidation code. He said his budget office was a good thing—a good institution. He did not at any time say his annual budget is the "first annual budget." But somehow this error "crept into the record." Several times the present Illinois budget is called the "first annual budget." And I have in my office now in the House Office Building a bound volume about as big as 100 pages of our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD bearing in gilt letters nearly an inch high the legend, "First Annual Budget, State of Illinois."

Now, it is not the first budget in Illinois. The Congressional Library has sent over at my request some of the annual budgets of Gov. Dunne—20 inches high, 30 inches long, 100 pages thick. And, by the way, the budget committee away back in 1913 included a man now a Member of this House, Hon. NIELS JUUL, of Illinois, then a member of the State Senate of Illinois, and his name appears in this old budget. So the "First Annual Budget of Illinois" is a misnomer. More confusion. When I was governor we also had a budget, although it was a book of typewritten leaves. And Alexander Hamilton had his budget—first Secretary of the Treasury. It will be a long time before we get a better budget than Alexander Hamilton's budget. You can see it also in the Library of Congress.

Finally, a budget system by no means indicates economy. It may cause economy; it may not. In England budgets are not new. But expenditures are ever more extensive and more and more extensive. Prof. Collins, who testified before our committee, said in substance:

> I do not say the cost will be less; it may cost more. But it will enable you to perceive and handle more intelligently your income and its sources and your various expenditures.

So, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not necessarily reduce expenses or taxes, does not necessarily reduce pay rolls or employees, does not give Congress any check on the President; does give the President power to appoint a life-long employee to terrorize Congress, and is based on many misunderstandings and possibly unintentional misrepresentations; and I can not vote for it.

By the way, it so happens that, in voting this way, I am voting with the President and not against him on this subject. That is exactly what I propose and intend to do—when he is right. I intend, as long as I am here, to vote with him when he is right. Democratic President or Republican President, when he is right we ought to support him. Abraham Lincoln once said:

> I am not afraid to go along with any man when he is right, and I am not afraid to part with any man when he is wrong.

I voted against the President when he vetoed the bill repealing the daylight saving law because he was wrong. But at that time I stated that I did not think the people of Illinois sent me a thousand miles to Washington just to vote against Woodrow Wilson, except when he was wrong. As to the daylight saving thing he was wrong. So I voted against him. When he vetoed the peace resolution, I voted against him. He was wrong. He ought to have approved the peace resolution. But as to this budget thing, he was right. So I vote with him. And "if this be treason, make the most of it!"

The Federal Reserve Board Is to Blame.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. KING,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express in the closing hours of this session of Congress my deepest regret concerning lack of action on the part of the Federal Reserve Board in taking measures to reduce the high cost of living for which the administration of this board is largely to blame.

The members of the Federal Reserve Board, who no doubt are most excellent gentlemen, fail to appreciate the great crisis facing this country, a crisis in which they play the major part.

On February 28 last I introduced a resolution in this body providing for the investigation of the administration of the Federal reserve act, and at that time I publicly charged the Federal reserve administration with being the cause of three-fourths of the high cost of living in that the Federal Reserve System was furnishing the funds with which profiteers, hoarders, and speculators in the large eastern cities of the United States were cornering necessities and juggling the prices skyward, while the people, undernourished and garbed in rags, were totally unable to meet living expenses.

Due to agitation begun at that time Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, called a conference of financial leaders in Washington last month, at which methods of reducing the inflation and faint efforts to peck at the financing of speculators were considered. Gov. Harding declined to permit me to attend the conference, stating that it was strictly private, although the welfare of the entire Nation was at stake.

From evidence which poured in to me at the time I was able to give out publicly the following statement:

> Enormous increases in the cost of necessities through the financing of the Federal reserve have netted millions in the worst form of profiteers.
> The sugar shortage is due almost entirely to the financing of the hoarders by the Federal reserve. The Bureau of Markets to-day informs me that on April 23 there were 127,947 tons of raw sugar stocks in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, compared with 110,991 tons a year ago. But with the aid of our Government, working through the Federal reserve, these hoarders of sugar are enabled to keep it off the market. Withdraw your credit and these stocks will come tumbling on the market in adequate quantities and at reasonable prices. These sugar stocks are being released in just sufficient amounts to maintain the shortage and keep the price soaring.
> Although wool garments are at prohibitive figures, the supply of wool in March was 487,107,000 pounds, compared with 478,697,000 pounds a year ago. As long as the Federal reserve will loan unlimited amounts of money to the holders of this wool, the wool will be allowed to filter on the market only in sufficient quantities to maintain the price. A large amount of raw silk is being hoarded in New York. We may soon expect to have Federal reserve bank notes issued against this silk.
> In New York City alone there is held at present 70,415,000 pounds of unsold condensed and evaporated milk, compared with 8,061,000 pounds a year ago. Financing is enabling the holders to keep the milk off the market and the price up, although total stocks in the United States are 250 per cent in excess of those a year ago.
> If prices dropped suddenly, the Federal reserve would be hard hit, and Governor Harding knows it. But if the issuance of Federal reserve money is continued there will be an awful day of reckoning, and that is what my resolution would avoid. We must stop financing speculators and hoarders. Reserve agents have urged bankers to extend credit in unconscionable amounts, assuring the bankers that every demand for more money will be filled by them. Bankers have in some instances, I regret to learn, loaned money to speculators with the understanding that they were to have half the profits for financing the deal. The volume of credit has increased, with only the sky as the limit.
> I have in mind one case where national banks purchased Government certificates of indebtedness netting approximately 5 per cent interest from the Federal reserve bank, and the next day put up those same certificates with the reserve bank and borrowed the money back at 3½ per cent, thus making a clear 1 per cent and more on the money which had been loaned only in imagination.
> Small State banks are accused of being unpatriotic in not taking these certificates of indebtedness which they would have to retain. Federal reserve banks will not accept the notes of farmers, and hence the small bank has its hands full taking care of its own customers. The Federal reserve prefers the notes of speculators. Feats of financial chicanery and jugglery which would have shamed the imagination of Baron Munchausen have taken place under the present administration of the Federal Reserve System.

Although the members of the Federal Reserve Board are too highly trained and learned men to be ignorant of the part they were playing, they continued to endeavor to raise the stone of oppression from the backs of the common people with twigs and thread when full facilities were available.

Because of their procrastination, on May 21 I introduced a bill making it unlawful for any Federal reserve bank to accept renewals of commodity notes. This bill would have enabled the Federal reserve to continue to aid legitimate commerce, but it would definitely and emphatically have ended the continual renewing of purely speculative paper for profiteers engaged in gouging out their last possible pound of flesh from the public. This bill lacked time for consideration at this session, but I predict that the subject will be a pertinent one next December unless the Federal reserve administration changes its tactics.

The New York World on May 28 contained an article explaining how certain New York banks, prompted by their own caution, were barring loans to food speculators. The article is, in part, as follows:

> Fearful of a business reversal of the kind that is being experienced in the shoe and other industries, big banking concerns of this city, which extend credits to merchants handling foodstuffs, have cut off the speculator from their credit books.
> This statement was made to a World reporter yesterday afternoon by Samuel S. Conover, president of the Fidelity Trust Co., Broadway and Chambers Street. The Fidelity Trust is one of the numerous banks that do a general accounting and credit business with wholesale commission merchants.
> Mr. Conover had invited the newspaper men to his office to explain a long statement his bank has compiled showing the increase in wholesale prices for a number of years. This survey is very thorough, but much of the material it contains has been published in The World. It was suggested to Mr. Conover that the public was interested to know just what steps banks are taking to end profiteering and to help bring prices back to a reasonable basis. Mr. Conover said:

ADMITS BANKS ERRED.

"Banks have unconsciously contributed their share to high food prices by extending credits to evident speculators in the necessities of life. But you may publish this for this bank, and I know it is the attitude of a great many other institutions doing business with food men, that hereafter no credit of any kind will be extended to professional speculators in foodstuffs. You can not make this too emphatic. Credit will be extended only to legitimate merchants actively engaged in the wholesale food business, whether as a commission man or distributor."

Asked if it were not true that the speculators in foodstuffs have received even larger credits than merchants doing business in the market districts, Mr. Conover replied:

"I can not go as far as that, but it is a fact that the speculator has been given more credit than he was entitled to. He is very largely to blame for present conditions, and the sooner he is eliminated from the business the better it will be for merchants who are known to be merchants and nothing else."

A prominent New Jersey financial expert, in expressing his regret at the conditions obtaining, said:

The correct way for mending the trouble is for the Federal Reserve Board to limit paper eligible for rediscount to such as is absolutely self-liquidating and has never been renewed either in whole or in part. They should have done this in the first place. The present condition was foreseen years ago.

The Federal reserve expands but does not contract. All attempts to reduce commodity prices while the Federal reserve bank is continuing its present practices are simply ludicrous.

It is now reported that every form of circulating notes, with the exception of Federal reserve notes, are to be retired. It may be that is best. However, with the late R. G. Ingersoll, I want a circulating note that can look me in the face and say "I know that my redeemer liveth."

A prominent Arkansas banker in writing me stated:

Reduce the commercial paper 50 per cent and the hoarded merchandise will come out of hiding places and go on the market at a legitimate profit.

Mr. Speaker, I can not too earnestly urge the members of the Federal Reserve Board to at once do their part in eliminating profiteering and hoarding.

Reducing the Price of Shoes and Men's Collars.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 3, 1920.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the high cost of living has been enhanced by the prices charged for men's collars and for shoes for all members of the family.

In August, 1919, when the collar manufacturers contemplated an increase in the price of collars, I wrote the Attorney General, and he replied that the matter would receive consideration and investigation. On August 20, 1919, I wrote the Federal Trade Commission and received the following reply:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
Washington, August 29, 1919.

Price of linen collars.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of August 20, 1919, was duly received.

Answering your inquiry, the commission some time ago made an investigation of the principal manufacturers engaged in producing this commodity—Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.)—and finding it had reason to believe that section 5 of the act of September 26, 1914, was being violated, issued its complaint No. D 90 against that concern. A copy of this complaint is inclosed herewith, and you will see from an examination of it that the principal averments relate to maintenance of resale prices. This case is being prosecuted and is expected to come to trial soon.

The other matters to which you refer, such as price-fixing combination or profiteering, would seem to fall rather within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice.

Very truly, yours,

VICTOR MURDOCK,
Acting Chairman.

The complaint is as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Before Federal Trade Commission, ss:

At a regular session of the Federal Trade Commission, held at its office in the city of Washington, D. C., on the 15th day of April, A. D. 1918.

Present: William J. Harris (chairman), William B. Colver, J. Franklin Fort, Victor Murdock, commissioners.

Federal Trade Commission v. Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.), Docket No. 90. Complaint in the matter of the alleged violation of section 5 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914.

The Federal Trade Commission, having reason to believe from a preliminary investigation made by it that Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.), hereinafter referred to as the respondent, has been and is using unfair methods of competition in interstate commerce in violation of the provisions of section 5 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," and it appearing that a proceeding by it in respect thereof would be to the interest of the public, issues this complaint, stating its charges in that respect on information and belief as follows:

PARAGRAPH 1. That the respondent, Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.), is now and was at all times hereinafter mentioned a corporation organized, existing, and doing business under and by virtue of the laws of the State of New York, having its principal office and place of business located at the city of New York, in said State, now and for more than two years last past engaged in the manufacture and sale of men's collars among the several States of the United States, the Territories thereof, and the District of Columbia, in direct competition with other persons, firms, copartnerships, and corporations similarly engaged.

PAR. 2. That the respondent, Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.), in the conduct of its business manufactures such collars, so sold by it, in its factories located at the cities of Troy, Waterford, Rochester, and Corinth, State of New York; Leominster, State of Massachusetts; South Norwalk, State of Connecticut; St. Johns, Province of Quebec, Canada; and purchases and enters into contracts of purchase for the necessary component materials needed therefor in different States and Territories of the United States, causing the same to be transported to its various factories, where they are made into the finished product and sold and shipped to the purchasers thereof; that after such collars are so manufactured they are continuously moved to, from, and among other States and Territories of the United States, the District of Columbia, and foreign countries, and there is continuously and has been at all times hereinafter mentioned a constant current of trade and commerce in said collars between and among the various States and Territories of the United States, the District of Columbia, and foreign countries.

PAR. 3. That with the intent and purpose and effect of stifling and suppressing competition in the manufacture, marketing, and sale of its collars in the course of such commerce and as a means of securing the trade of dealers and obtaining their aid and cooperation in enlarging the sale of its collars, and with the purpose of eliminating competition in the selling price among the various dealers in its collars and thereby depriving the dealers of their freedom to sell such collars at prices which, in their judgment, would be warranted by trade conditions and for other purposes, the respondent has fixed and maintained certain specified standard prices at which the collars manufactured and sold by it shall be resold by the purchaser thereof, and requires its purchasers to agree to maintain or resell such collars at such standard selling prices; and that for the purpose of maintaining said standard resale prices and of inducing and compelling its customers to maintain and keep such standard prices the respondent for more than six months last past has refused, and still is refusing, to sell its products to customers or dealers who will not agree to maintain such specified standard resale prices or who do not resell such products at the specified standard selling prices so fixed and determined by the respondent as aforesaid.

Therefore, notice is hereby given you, Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.), that the charges of this complaint will be heard by the Federal Trade Commission at its office in the Federal Trade Commission Building, Fifteenth and K Streets, city of Washington, D. C., on the 8th day of June, 1918, at 10.30 o'clock in the forenoon of the said day, or as soon thereafter as the same may be reached, at which time and place you shall have the right to appear and show cause why an order should not be entered by the Federal Trade Cimmission requiring you to cease and desist from the violations of law charged in this complaint.

You will take notice that within 30 days after the service of this complaint you are required to file with the Federal Trade Commission an answer in conformity with rule 3 of the Rules of Practice before the commission.

In witness whereof the Federal Trade Commission has caused this complaint to be issued, signed by its secretary, and its official seal to be affixed hereto at the city of Washington, D. C., this 15th day of April, A. D. 1918.

By the commission.

[SEAL.] L. L. BRACKEN,
Secretary.

The publicity given to my action in the newspapers stopped the increase in price for seven months. Believing that the public had fallen asleep, the collar manufacturers raised their prices in March, 1920. The following letters were then written by me:

MARCH 8, 1920.

Hon. C. B. AMES,
Assistant to the Attorney General,
Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. AMES: On August 23 you wrote me that you were investigating the increase of the price of collars. Up to date I have heard nothing further. The newspaper publicity at that time prevented the increase. It is now announced that the increase is to go into effect. Collars sold two for 25 cents two years ago. To pay 30 and 35 cents now seems to be and is unwarranted.

The Federal Trade Commission has gathered evidence in regard to the price of linen collars, and it seems to me that something should be done promptly in this matter.

Very sincerely, yours,

ISAAC SIEGEL.

MARCH 8, 1920.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: On August 29 you wrote me that the case against Cluett, Peabody & Co. (Inc.) was expected to be brought to trial soon. What has become of this case? You have undoubtedly read in the newspapers that collars are to be sold from 30 cents to 35 cents each which sold two for 25 cents two years ago. May I have your prompt answer?

Very sincerely, yours,

ISAAC SIEGEL.

The New York Evening World published the following editorial on March 12, 1920:

PROSECUTE CLUETT, PEABODY & CO.

White collars are the hall-mark of the "new poor."

White collars are making the "new poor" even poorer.

Of all the revelations of profiteering which the Evening World has made, none, we think, will cause more aggravation and resentment than yesterday's exposé of the intolerable greed of Cluett, Peabody & Co.

Prices of white linen collars have advanced from 12½ cents to 30 cents. The quality has been debased. Profits have risen from $1,871,000 in 1918 to $5,153,000 in 1919.

If Attorney General Palmer can not find material for the prosecution of profiteering in such figures, he can find it nowhere.

The Attorney General has proclaimed his friendly feeling for organized labor. Here is his opportunity to court favor with the "white-collar class" as well.

Get after Cluett, Peabody & Co.

White collars are more than a symbol. They are becoming a yoke.

The price of a collar is now 25 cents retail, but the retailer is now paying $2.40 a dozen, when in 1918 he paid $1.10 a dozen.

As chairman of the Committee on the Census it was my pleasure to report immediately the Kreider bill, which provides for a monthly census of skins, hides, and so forth. This is now the law, and the result will be that no more will shoe manufacturers be able to say that there is a scarcity in hides, skins, and so forth, when as a matter of fact the contrary is true. Representative KREIDER is one of the large shoe manufacturers of the United States, and he is of the opinion that this law which bears his name will reduce the price of shoes at least 25 per cent. Already in every large city we are hearing that the price of shoes is coming down. If the American citizen will realize that we must increase production and that care must be exercised in buying, no matter what the article is, we will get back to normal very quickly. A little real thrift and a determination to do the most work while employed will soon give us real peace, prosperity, and contentment. If each citizen would practice this doctrine, then all of his coworkers would join and America would show the world an example to be emulated by the residents of all the war-stricken countries.

If You Make a Soldier of Every Man, as Germany and Russia Did, You Can Expect the Same Beautiful Results They Have and Are Achieving.

OF

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 18, 1920.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add a word or two to what I have already said in this debate to-day before we are clear away from the subject. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois that if we had been armed to the teeth when the European war began it would not have begun. That is a mere guess, and one man guesses one way and one another. There is nothing in that argument, because it is pure conjecture. Possibly it is true if we had been armed to the teeth and had joined with England and Italy to help France when invasion of Belgium was threatened we would not have had the war. But that is not Admiral Sims's view. According to him we were just about as likely to have leaned one way as the other. Certainly there was nothing in the attitude of our national administration that would have made Germany pause at those awful moments.

But that is not the point. The gentleman does not come to the point. The point is not whether we could have bluffed somebody out of the war or not. You talk about military training, and if it means anything it means the Prussian system. If you were talking about the Swiss system, that is a wholly different proposition. But when you say military training in the sense it is used at Army headquarters, it means something like that in Germany or France. In the first place, it seeks to take men from their work and make every one of them a soldier. Do not get the idea that you can make a soldier out of every man in the country without the natural results. The Russians are all soldiers. They are all fighting and licking everybody they can get to. What is Germany doing? Fighting every day. They were crazy on military training. They have been taught to bear arms and fight, and when you get the whole world in such a condition of mind as that you are going to have war. What is the use of talking about that? Every sensible man knows it. If you make a soldier of every man, as Germany and Russia did, you can expect the same beautiful results they have and are achieving. There are enough menaces hanging over this country without making soldiers of everybody, and without having them go to camp and bear arms all the time. The principal point is not that we could perhaps bluff somebody from fighting. That might happen occasionally. It is the idea of uselessly taking young men out of the industries who should be working and of teaching men to have in mind all the time the continual taste of war and the desire to fight. That is what might ruin a republic. It is the serious menace. They had a republic two or three days ago in Berlin. What have they to-day? A military despot. What is the matter? Some men who had been trained for years went down there to fight, as was their trade.

Mr. CLEARY. Does not the gentleman think the League of Nations would remedy all that?

Mr. LITTLE. What have I to do with the League of Nations? I am not a Senator. I would like to see some arrangement that would constitute an international tribunal to adjust international difficulties. I believe it might be done, and I will go a step further and say that I believe that if the matter had been handled shrewdly by our representatives in Paris we could now have such a treaty throughout the world. [Applause.] It was a golden opportunity lost, and I believe they could have made such a treaty as would have practically made arms and armament unnecessary forever if the American Government had been represented as judiciously as it should have been. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY] want a League of Nations that would send our boys to stop the riots in Germany? I do not! "Remedy all that," he says. We can not aid Germany to "remedy that." She must help herself by abolishing militarism.

There are probably about a million young men in the United States who come of age every year, earning on the average, perhaps, a hundred dollars a month, the total of a hundred million dollars a month. The military party wishes to withdraw them from the industries for six months every year, which would entail an immediate loss of $600,000,000 that they would not earn while in the Regular Army conscription for training. Experience has indicated that it costs about a thousand dollars to make a soldier out of a young man in six months, which would be a thousand million of dollars you would expend. Here is an actual loss of a billion six hundred millions in half a year if you attempt the system of compulsory military training advocated by the General Staff. They say they wish to do this to avoid future wars. That is the reason we had the late war, because Germany and Russia and those countries spent 50 years and millions of money getting ready for it. That is the reason two-thirds of Europe is afire with war now, because the soldiers they "prepared" to fight keep right on fighting.

If you wish to spend a billion dollars a year to avoid war, why not subsidize the nations of Europe by paying them a billion dollars a year to disarm and go to work? Gentlemen, you must be reasonable and learn to turn a deaf ear to the arguments of the munition factories and their coadjutors.

Attune your ears rather, gentlemen of the House, to the sounds that came from the battle fields along the French, Italian, Serbian, and Armenian frontiers; to the roar of the cannon that leaves so many coffins in its trail; to the wail of the dying as they gasp for their last breath so far from home. Listen not to the specious arguments of those who wish you to tread in the paths Germany has followed, but to the ominous and foreboding echoes that resound in our ears throughout this debate, giving token of strife, sorrow, riot, and rebellion in half the capitals of Europe. The fight to disarm the world was won by our soldiers, and we should write into the laws of the world the decrees they fulminated on the field of battle. To do this, gentlemen, America should maintain, not sacrifice, the leadership of the world. Nothing could be more imprudent, nothing could be more unwise, than to join in a system that would give the pigmy nations of the globe an equal voice with this great Republic at the council table of the nations. The safety of the world's future depends upon the American leadership which has been evolved after centuries of struggle. If we yield America's baton to a group of puny peoples at such a critical emergency, the sun of liberty and Christianity, which rose so brilliantly from the Atlantic and had just reached its zenith to illuminate the continents, would—

> Set weeping in a lowly west,
> Witnessing storms to come, woe, and unrest.

I do not hesitate to say to you, my colleagues, that in my opinion when the President of the United States went to the world's council at Paris he was actuated by lofty ideals, and it is a God's pity that he became so obsessed by his own theories of how the world should be confederated that he lost all sense of perspective and proportion in government. He forgot that his first duty was to the American people, not to other nations. He failed to appreciate that the preservation of the American Republic's foremost position in world politics is essential to the safety of other peoples as well as our own. He disdained the mandate of the Constitution that the President can make treaties only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He assumed to speak to the globe as the sole representative of a hundred million Americans without consulting them or their representatives. But those the Constitution accredited with the authority to determine on the equity and prudence of his propositions declined to approve them, in order that America might not abdicate that lofty position to which she had attained by the valor of her soldiers and the wisdom of her statesmen in 300 years of human effort and human liberty such as the world never elsewhere has witnessed. The hour struck, the man did not appear, and the golden opportunity of the moment was gone. Hereafter American statesmen must remember that the highest wisdom and the greatest strength is the reply that comes to the appeal to the people at home. [Applause.]

Price of Petroleum and its Products.

OF

HON. DICK T. MORGAN,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, April 5, 1920.

The House had under consideration House resolution No. 501, authorizing the Federal Trade Commisison to investigate and report as to the causes of the recent advances in the price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House (H. Res. 501) is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to make an immediate inquiry and investigation into the causes of the recent advances in the price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products and report to the House not later than June 1, 1920; and in reporting the foregoing the Federal Trade Commission is requested to take into consideration and to report the sources of oil supply for the United States and the profits of said business, and what, if any, combinations in restraint of trade exist between those engaged in this business, and what effect, if any, the same have upon the market price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products with reference to the price charged to the ultimate consumer.

Mr. Speaker, Oklahoma is a great oil-producing State. I should not vote for any resolution which I thought would unjustly injure any great business interest of my State. However, all the people of the United States are interested in the price of oil and its products, which are in almost universal use. This resolution comes from the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member. I know there was no evidence brought before this committee which even tended to prove that the price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products is the result of any conspiracy, combination, or trust among the producers of these products. In fact, the Judiciary Committee reported the resolution to the House without any hearing whatever, and hence without any evidence on which it could act. This House is, of course, in the same position as the Judiciary Committee. There is no evidence before the House to show that the price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products is the result of monopolistic control. The oil interests of this country ought not, therefore, to feel that the passage of this resolution is a reflection upon them. A few years ago we created the Federal Trade Commission. The very object and purpose of bringing this great commission into existence was to have an administrative body empowered and equipped for just such investigations as this resolution authorizes. The oil business has become a great industry. Great financial interests are centered in it. Many people are interested in this industry. They are entitled to fair treatment. But I do not believe in monopolies in any line of business. I do not believe that prices should be controlled by any kind of conspiracies, combinations, or trusts. I believe that all of our great business interests should be so conducted that the owners and managers thereof will be willing at all times to have their business methods investigated by the Federal Trade Commission, a governmental instrumentality created for this character of work. I shall therefore vote for this resolution.

OF

HON. HENRY D. FLOOD,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to print granted to me by the House I include herewith the address of Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, of Tennessee, as temporary chairman of the Democratic convention of that State called to select delegates to the Democratic national convention at San Francisco and to nominate candidates for presidential electors. His remarks apply as well to the Nation at large as to his own State of Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT said:

"Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I trust that I do not speak to-day to a Democracy which is either disheartened or despondent.

"We stand upon the threshold of a campaign in which the heart and conscience of the Nation are to be searched as they have not been searched for half a century—indeed, as they have never been in all our history as a sovereign people.

"We have many and vital things that are old with which to keep the ancient and unswerving faith pledged by the fathers and founders of our historic organization, and we have things that are new, things of the most tremendous import ever faced by the sons and daughters of men, to which we must apply the fundamentals of our party creed and through its application not only solve the problems of our State and our Nation, but do our share without shrinking or shirking in bringing peace to a war-stricken world, in restoring order where chaos now riots, threatening the whole fabric of human society upon every continent and every island of the multitudinous seas.

"It is a time, ladies and gentlemen of Tennessee, for plainness of speech, for resoluteness of purpose, for candor of conduct, and for vigor of action. We shall not win by timorous trimming of the sails to every passing breeze which blows; we must not be deceived by the cross currents; they will drive us upon the shoals, will dash us upon the rocks, will beat us to pieces in the shallows, and our wreck will mean the wreck of the newborn hopes of humanity, the destruction of that new chart of human freedom written for the world and its peoples in the lifeblood of unnumbered millions of men who perished in the welter of war, that mankind might be and remain free.

"We must, my friends, take counsel of our courage and forget our fears.

"The creatures least needed in the Democratic Party to-day are the pestiferous demagogue and the spineless timeserver. We want women and men of lofty faith and stainless ideals. It is to these that we must look for the leadership. These are they whose services are challenged for America and for the world in these crucial hours of history and destiny.

"The imperious demand of the age, the demand which is not to be denied if we would triumph over the sordidness and selfishness which our enemies are seeking to enthrone in the places of power, is for clear vision, for hands that do not tremble, for hearts that do not quake.

"Give us these; give us platforms not of placid platitudes or soulless solemnities but of clear-ringing words; words that will interpret themselves in unmistakable terms to the minds and hearts of the peoples of America; words that shall demonstrate our recognition of the vastnesses that are about us and over us, of the obligations which the Nation could not if it would escape and live and demonstrate, too, our own readiness to meet those obligations as becometh a great, heroic party with a history of achievement such as no political organization in all the tides of time can boast; send us forth to the battle, not with an apology upon our lips but glorying in our past and decided as to our future, militant, aggressive at every point, resolute at every angle, and we shall win.

"The womanhood of America, the manhood of America, are ready to respond to an appeal to their seriousness, to their intelligence, to their courage. They will not fail to detect shams or to spurn frauds with contempt. There is—let us not blind ourselves and refuse to see—a spirit of restlessness and discontent, the sources of which I shall later advert to, among our fellow citizens which constitutes an important element that confronts us.

"To this spirit you may rest assured our political foes will make their appeal. It is their sole hope of success. Every artifice, every sinister insinuation, every calumnious slander that ingenious and designing political partisans can devise and improvise will be resorted to. These base things constitute the rungs of the ladder upon which they seek to climb once more to power.

"Shall they be permitted by reason of any folly upon our part thus to succeed? For the sake of our Nation, of whose glorious past Democracy has written the brightest chapters; for the sake of our future, the vital things of which depend upon Democratic success; for the sake of all that all humanity hopes for and strives for, let us, my fellow Democrats, search ourselves, hearten ourselves, bestir ourselves, and see to it that we shall win, to the end that the honor of the Republic may be kept unsullied and the glory always ours, and within the last eight years made to glow with an hundredfold effulgence, is kept unblemished.

"I think, ladies and gentlemen, that at the very basis of our endeavor and enterprise there must lie an unequivocal declaration, a nontemporizing assertion, which will mean that the Democratic Party does not believe that there is anywhere any room for any individual, citizen or alien, to walk in freedom beneath the flag of free men when that individual attacks the institutions of government over which that flag waves and spurns the principles of government of which it is the solemn symbol.

"Of this I am absolutely certain: If any phase of the fundamentals of Bolshevik doctrine are to succeed through the instrumentality of a political party, there is no place in that party for me.

"I have not infrequently wondered as I have sat in the committee rooms of Congress and heard unfolded the tales of machination on the part of those people, mostly foreigners, who have accepted our hospitality only to try to raise a poisoned chalice to our lips; as I have read the sinister and devilish propaganda with which the mails are becoming choked; as I have seen the effects of appeals to the ignorant and the discontented, whether our people here in Tennessee—in the million homes on hillside and in valley, in quiet village or amid the city's hum and bustle—realize in its fullness the menace that is involved and the danger that besets even us.

"If I know anything of Democratic principles; if I have not wholly misinterpreted Democratic tradition and history, my party has stood from the day of Jefferson until now for individualism in every activity where individualism could have play without trenching upon the rights of others; has recognized and stood ready to defend with every resource of law—and, if need be, arms—the right of the individual honestly to acquire, and having acquired, uninterruptedly to enjoy as his own, property, both real and personal; furthermore, it believes in governments of constitutions and laws, made by the people through representatives of their selection, or, in matters upon which it may be practicable to operate, by themselves directly; it believes, it knows, that in all the history of man no governmental edifice constructed by his genius has ever approached the structure given unto us by the builders of this Republic's Constitution in its assurance of liberty of action to its sovereign citizens.

"Certainly, it is my view that whatever strikes at these things strikes at the very heart—aye, at the living soul—of the Democratic Party.

"Academic, does some one say? Perhaps. But, oh, ladies and gentlemen, if you could but see as I have seen the efforts, sometimes veiled and sometimes boldly defiant, to tear down our forms of government and to rear in their stead an edifice of anarchy, or syndicalism; if you have seen the poisoned arrow leveled straight at the heart of our Constitution and laws; if you have learned of the insidious movement, financed to an extent that no revolution has ever been by the loot of Russia, to transplant here to America the sovietism of that unhappy land; if you but realize that in the great industrial centers in particular the wily and sinister apostles of riot are striving, and not without success, to cultivate the inspiration of anarchy in the souls of the ignorant, the unfortunate, and the discontented, I think a reference to the academics of democracy's faith would not at least be resented in these troublesome hours.

"These are some of the old things to which we must affirm our allegiance and to whose maintenance we must unequivocally plight our efforts and our party honor.

"It is one of the glories of our national administration that at every turn, in war and in peace, while striving, with a sympathy that at times occasioned criticism from certain sources, to insure and protect the legitimate rights of the great body of labor, it has been always quick to distinguish with clearness and precision between its rights and the unholy efforts of those who, masquerading in its garments, were leveling their blows at law and order, at the Government itself, and that the instrumentalities of the Government have been unhesitatingly invoked to crush, and ruthlessly, the vipers of violence and lawlessness; and surely it must be a matter of pride to every right-thinking citizen of this great Commonwealth, whatever his party predilection, that in the crucial hours, when every section has been threatened with the rise of chaos, there stood side by side with the national administration in its hour of stress and strain, his face set like flint for order, his bold heart pitted with unquavering loyalty against the evils and terrors of lawlessness, the chief executive of Tennessee. Surely should any party attempt in Tennessse, directly or insidiously, to make an appeal to whatever of discontent his course in that regard may have occasioned, it will bring itself under the condemnation of a loyal people, and be lashed as with scorpions.

"It must be ever remembered that in the Democratic Party lies the hope for the crushing of the rising radical menace, and therefore the greater and the graver is our responsibility. Our political foes from the hour in which they lost their first, and infinitely their greatest, leader—Abraham Lincoln—gradually and steadily began to draw away from the humanitarian aspects of government. The outcome of the War of Secession, the inevitable logic of its passion, was to make the Republican Party for long years the dominant political force of America. To it therefore there flocked all the forces that were seeking governmental privilege, all the powers who wished to profit by legislative legerdemain and the manipulation of governmental functions. These seized upon it and made it their own.

"While the great masses of men sustained it and kept it in power because of their devotion to its traditions, special interests silently, stealthily, but ever steadily wove their threads into its web and woof, until the high idealism which marked its birth and glorified its infancy was crushed out of its organism and it stood forth before men as the party, not of humanity but of privilege; not as an organization of inspiration but as a business machine, organized, financed, dominated by those who could benefit by its success at the expense of their fellows.

"It lost its heart; its human sympathies were so enveloped by selfishness and agreed that they withered and ceased to function, and the great masses of humanity who toil could find in it nothing of recognition.

"Democracy when standing squarely upon democratic principles held out for labor a legitimate hope which it could not elsewhere find, and to-day its confidence is ours. To retain it we have not to promise special favors. We shall have all that is worth while, all that will add strength to our cause if we shall but be true to the fundamentals of our faith and stand four-square for liberty governed by law. The great body of labor in these United States, organized and unorganized, is loyal to the principles of our Government and not sympathetic with the radicals which would destroy it. Their intelligence makes them to know that their opportunity and the opportunities of those who are to come after them lie in the preservation of those principles. All they ask, all that the great body of them ask, is that those principles be correctly applied to the events and vicissitudes of human life. They recognize that democracy has a pulsing heart and a sympathetic soul. They are of us and with us. Now and then some pseudo leader oversteps the bounds and abuses his power, but the mass is true and steadfast.

"They know they can not turn to the Republican Party with any hope that the sordid selfishness which began to grip it half a century ago and at length became its unresisted master has released its strangle hold.

"They have but to read the shameful record of recent weeks, the record developed by a committee of the Senate of the United States, to behold how in this year of Republican hope gold has flowed forth in an ever-increasing stream to purchase the Republican nomination for the Presidency of the United States. If for the nomination alone millions are poured out, what may we not anticipate when that struggle is over and all the special interests combine and rally around the nominee of that convention?

"Oh, my countrymen! My countrywomen! Has the cycle of history brought humanity again to an era of shamelessness such as marked the period of degradation when the crown of once imperial Rome was hawked about the seven-hilled city for sale to the highest bidder?

"It is not so. The clean womanhood and fine manhood of America will beat back this rising tide of corruption; will preserve for themselves and their children in unsullied purity and unstained integrity the priceless heritage of constitutional liberty and legal equality.

"It was 10 years ago this autumn when the people of this Republic, disappointed and disgusted at the breaking of the covenants that had been entered into with them by the Republican Party two years before, gave to Democracy its first opportunity for two decades to serve humanity by the election of a Democratic House of Representatives. In this narrow and restricted field there was little which could be accomplished, but that little Democracy did. Two years later the party was intrusted with the full power in both the executive and legislative branches, and during the six succeeding years ours was the opportunity and the responsibility. Surely I need not dwell upon the history of those years, so filled with luster as to constitute the most glorious epoch in the history of any nation in the life of the world. Whatever may happen adown the centuries, we may say with certainty that the story of those six years is as ineffaceable from the annals of humanity as are the eternal stars from the everlasting heavens.

"Special privilege, intrenched for nearly half a century, was attacked without hesitation and the major operation was performed of cutting from the body of the Government the diseased tissues, the flabby excretions, the gangrenous formations which were poisoning it to its death.

"We formulated and put into operation a revenue system, predicated not upon the protective-tariff principle that one man may be taxed for the direct and private benefit of another man, the manipulation of the taxing power for private gain rather than for public necessities, but upon the theory that taxation is only for the benefit of organized society.

"Through half a century of well-nigh uninterrupted control the Republican Party had built up a system of banking and currency laws under which again and again the Nation was swept by panic, its normal life diverted, its industries stilled, its prosperity paralyzed, while suffering and want stalked abroad in the midst of plenty. It was a system which constantly tempted the use of power for the bringing of artificial panics, with their resultant depressions, profitable to a few hundred, destructive to millions.

"For it the Democratic Party substituted the present Federal Reserve System, under which the Republic has without a quiver in its fiscal affairs passed through the greatest of wars, weathering without tremor every storm. It has made this Nation the financial model for all the world.

"It is no part of my purpose to review here the achievements which marked the earlier years of Democratic control. They were constructive; they were fundamental; they were humanitarian and sound. The excision of favoritism and special privilege went forward steadily, unswervingly. The people were restored to their own. They were able to feel that their Government once more had come into their possession.

"Then came the war of Europe, and, despite all the efforts of an administration profoundly devoted to peace, we at length had to choose between the surrender of national honor and casting our own sword into the contest. Of course, there was but one course to pursue. That nation which will not protect to the uttermost the unquestioned and unquestionable rights of its citizens on land or on sea can not live and does not deserve to live.

"We entered the struggle, and we settled the issue of arms.

"There is no epoch in all the annals of mankind which compares in point of success with the execution of the war program planned and completed by a Democratic administration in the mighty contest with Germany.

"Never a battle lost, never a serious check encountered by American arms, though they drove against hitherto unconquered legions and assailed divisions whose lines had never been broken. This was not the result of chance; it was the logical culmination of plans formulated with mathematical exactness; not plans of military strategy alone, but of the things behind the lines. The supply of man power would have been worse than useless without the supply of equipment. Back of the battle fire is always the silent and often unseen force of civil administration whose duty it is to coordinate the resources of the Nation and fling them upon the pivotal point at the psychological hour. Consider, will you not, the financing of the Great War? No special agents of financial interests were called in to sell the Nation's bonds to its people with fat commissions for their reward. A Democratic administration went straight to the people, explained to them the Nation's necessities, and sold the bonds at par and without commission. A Republican administration, fighting the War of Secession, and with all the rest of the world to draw upon, was compelled when it would borrow funds to call in the magnates of finance to raise millions, and could only obtain money by selling the country's obligations at less than face value. A Democratic administration, fighting upon the battle field of the world, and having only the resources of this country to appeal to, floated twenty-four billions of bonds and other securities and obtained for them dollar for dollar.

"This is unparalleled in the history of the world. Democratic foresight and genius had devised a financial system flexible, sound to the heart, and ready even in its infancy, and almost before its organization had been completed, to stand stanch against the strain of a war such as mankind had never before believed would be possible.

"Transportation facilities were coordinated upon land and upon sea. All our lives we had heard it said, and most of us believed it, that any war which we might have with a European country that possessed no lands in the Americas at which we could strike would of necessity be a naval contest, because of the physical impossibility of transporting troops and the supplies and arms to sustain them; but in a period of little more than 12 months we had raised and equipped 4,000,000 men; had transported 2,000,000 of them to Europe, and had 10,000 pouring upon her shores between every sunrise and sunset, with all the supplies for sustaining them—the best fed, the best clothed, the best equipped army that ever assembled under the flag of any sovereignty; and back of them a Nation whose resources were assembled and consolidated, all brought beneath the control of a hand that never trembled, all launched with an aim that never erred by him who stood upon a pinnacle the heights of which no human had ever approached before in history—the calm, the resolute, the imperturbable President of these United States.

"These were the things that brought the sudden and unexpected end.

"After Germany had felt the cold steel of American marines at Chateau-Thierry; after they had witnessed the breaking of the Hindenburg line by the Thirtieth Division—the men of the Carolinas and Tennessee—and the advancement of the Twenty-seventh to Gouy; after they had seen the Prussian Guard broken to pieces, its black eagles driven from the Argonne Forest; after she realized that American genius had mobilized and was thrusting forward all the resources of man power and material in limitless abundance, the German high authorities literally forced the allied and associated powers to accept her groveling plea for an armistice and agreed to terms than which nothing could have been more humiliating—not even the loss of national existence—for had they continued and that had occurred, a thing which no well-considered thought of her enemies could have wished, Germany would at least stand out in history as having fought to the death and died with that much honor.

"It was not chance but American genius which ground the throne of Germany to dust and laid autocracy in the tomb of time, from which it may not ever emerge in resurrection if the democratic spirit may but permeate the Senate of the United States and grip by solemn treaty, without reservation or interpretation that will change in any respect its meaning, the achievements which it has won.

"Oh, but we are told that all the traditions and practices of the Nation must be reversed; that the party in power during the conduct of a successful war must be discredited and turned from place, because, forsooth, there was patriotism and loyalty by those to whom leadership was denied by the election results of 1916.

"We do not impugn, upon the contrary we glory in, the courage and spirit of loyalty which marked the course of the masses without regard to individual political predilection, but I must declare to you that in the main the support which was given the administration by the larger number of the leaders of our political foes throughout the war was a support which was dogged and sullen, given grudgingly, and only out of fear of a people's wrath. Do not misunderstand me. I make no insinuations of treason on their part to their country, but even in the midst of war political machination was steadily at play. Most of the leaders of the Republican Party in the Congress moved always in an atmosphere of envy and took constant counsel of their chagrin. The proofs of this all men who were in the circles of Washington during those months of strain and stress who will honestly declare themselves will tell you, and some proofs are of open record. To the extent that they dared, party advantage was ever foremost in their meditations and manipulations; and I tell you now that among the Republican leaders in high places to-day you will find and hear expressed a hatred for Woodrow Wilson more intense and bitter than they have ever anywhere at any time expressed toward the German enemies of the Republic.

"President Wilson knew the spirit of Republican leadership when just before the election of 1918 he made his appeal to the country for a Congress in political sympathy with him. He knew what the record had been.

"He knew that before we entered the war, when it had been proposed in the Congress that we should warn our citizens against exercising their rights upon the high seas and stain the unsullied flag of the Republic, that 111 Republicans in the House of Representatives had voted to do it. He knew that while in the Sixty-fourth Congress we were seeking to pass a shipping bill that would furnish a merchant marine for our commerce and prepare us for war should we be compelled to enter, 160 Republicans in the House had voted against it. He knew that when we were compelled to change our revenue laws, so as to obtain the sinews of which we had been deprived by the loss of importations from the nations at war, 192 Republicans in the House had voted against it. He knew that 76 Republican Congressmen had voted to violate the practices of international law by stopping in the midst of war the shipment of munitions to those nations with whom we subsequently became associated in the conflict. He knew that when we were passing legislation to punish alien plotters who were seeking to blow up our factories and murder our people, 146 Republicans had registered their vote against it; and, about all, he knew that on the very day that war was declared there was introduced into the Congress by one Representative MADDEN, of Illinois, the same man who just a few days ago, in a burst of angry passion, insulted the memory of Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson, denouncing them as traitors on the floor of the House of Representatives, and this same Mr. MADDEN is one of the dominant members of the Republican steering committee of the House of Representatives, a principal figure in the formulation of Republican policy and will be one of the most potent of its leaders in the event of Republican success this autumn, a thing which Tennesseeans may not look forward to with joy; the President knew that Mr. MADDEN had introduced a resolution in Congress complacently proposing to infringe upon the constitutional authority and duty of the President by creating a congressional committee who should take over from the President the operation of the war; he knew that this resolution had been pressed with relentless vigor.

"Again and again we who were members of the Rules Committee, to which it was referred, were challenged to action upon it; were appealed to by the Republican forces; were assured of good intentions; were told that the President was too busy a man to run the war; he knew that they were pressing this resolution by every devious method known in the very midst of the great German drive of 1918 and throughout all that year; he knew that if they carried the Congress they would pass such a resolution and thrust their clumsy fingers into the delicate machinery of war, ready to injure their country if they could but embarrass him, whom they hated because they envied; or he knew that should the war end with them in power such was their malignancy of spirit as that the thing would happen which has happened; and that every move which he should make in negotiating peace and in trying to bring peace to a blood-soaked world would be thwarted if possible, diverted if it might be done, embarrassed wherever opportunity was afforded by the unholy schemes, the narrow ambitions, and the sordid selfishness of designing political marplots. He had vision and spoke with the tongue of prophecy when, in appealing to the people for a Democratic Congress, he declared in substance that our political foes sought not to support him but to control him.

"It has been all that he feared; perhaps even more. Our foes carried the Congress and organized both its branches; in the House he who had been for eight years their minority leader and who upon most war questions had shown himself big in spirit and vision and had refused to be a party to the constant nagging of the President was unceremoniously kicked from place, being refused the Speakership. Instead there was selected a gentleman from Massachusetts whose contempt for the President was known to be sufficient to satisfy the most exacting demand, and as floor leader there was chosen one who had been wrong upon nearly every war question and most all others. In the Senate leadership was conferred also upon a man from Massachusetts, Senator LODGE, whose controlling thought and passion had been antipathy to Mr. Wilson and whose dominant determination had been to destroy him and his work.

"Under such leadership and swayed by the bad passions of envy and enmity the Republican Congress convened in May, 1919. Since that time it was in practically continuous convention until Saturday, June 5, when its second session came to an inglorious, ignominious end. Its impotence long ago became the laughingstock of the Nation and its record is the shame of the Republic.

"No one need be surprised when it is remembered that the whole motive spring of its mechanism has been hatred; that it has had no thought or purpose save to discredit the President, thinking thereby to destroy the party whose leader he is.

"They have never paused in the midst of doing nothing except to do something worse.

"I have seen the entire Republican side of the House when the President has appeared in the Chamber to deliver a message, as was his practice before he was stricken with illness, deliberately, and as the result of a prearranged plan, insult him by remaining seated, contrary to custom, as he entered; I have heard a Republican Member while attacking him say with a sneer, 'and then he became sick,' and witnessed the Republican side break into smiles of rapture and bursts of applause. Should he die, I presume we might reasonably anticipate the most hilarious celebration in history among these leaders now struggling for power. I have heard him privately denounced in terms that could not be publicly used; have with disgust inexpressible heard his most delicate relationships made the butt of Republican jest, and have heard Republican Congressmen, supposed to be gentlemen, laugh at coarse jibes about him that would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of the gutter-snipe.

"What could one expect of a Congress dominated by such passion and devoted to such a hate? What, indeed, except that which has happened, the sinister effort to weave into all legislation whenever possible some stroke which he could feel?

"Confronted by problems graver in many aspects than any which the country has ever faced, they have dawdled in idleness while feeding upon passion.

"The President, in his message from France when the Congress convened in May, 1919, announced his purpose of returning the railroads to private operation January 1, 1920. Through long and weary months they trifled with the legislation which had to be passed until he was compelled to defer the date and finally gave us a measure with which many were so disgusted that they could not support it and which some of us did support with almost equal disgust as the best that was offered.

"No more important duty challenged the assumed statesmanship of a Republican Congress than the readjustment of the tax system developed by war for war to one of peace for peace. It was one which might have been approached without the slightest partisanism; the President recommended it; the Treasury begged for it; the business world demanded it; everybody wanted it.

"The answer of the Republican statesmanship to this was to pass through the House some six or eight popgun tariff bills dealing with such things as a tariff upon magnesite, in which not as many people as reside in any populous county of Tennessee have an interest, bills never intended for anything except to aid some single Representative's political fortunes. Even these bills died in the Senate, as was intended by their sponsors.

"Their only and master stroke in the effort to reduce the cost of living was embodied in a bill reported from the Committee on Ways and Means to place a prohibitive tariff on beans.

"They will tell you that they have saved money. When they do, ask them how. They will answer that it was done by not giving the departments all they estimated they could use. When they tell you this you will laugh and tell them that in this respect their course has not been different from practically all the Congresses that preceded them. You will not observe their alleged savings reflected in your Federal tax receipts when you come to pay in 1921.

"The epitome of absurdity was probably reached in the method employed by the innumerable investigating committees which have been appointed to probe the war expenditures. No constructive thing has been done or suggested by any one of these. The whole bent and purpose has been to find something, some expenditure, some act that would reflect discredit upon the responsible authority of the Government; when these efforts have proven futile it has in nowise changed their course in making report. They have deliberately disregarded every item of testimony which tended to glorify the country and have written into page after page of what they called reports the evidence of their preexisting prejudices.

"In all the vast activities of the war, every detail of which has been searched, they have found not one thing to which they give a word of praise. Over all their country's magnificent and unimpeachable record they have cast a ceaseless spray of undiluted criticism.

"I am happy to be able to tell you a thing which will stand out in history with distinct lines. From first to last, there were about 115,000 officials who had discretion in the expenditure of funds for war purposes and in the making of contracts. An intensely bitter and partisan committee composed of men of keenest intellectuality, shrewd and able lawyers, with the assistance of a horde of expert accountants, have scrutinized the records with painstaking care, and in the expenditure of some $18,000,000,000 there has not been found one case of graft or peculation on the part of responsible officials. It is an unapproachable record.

"Refusing to make peace as becometh a great Nation, conscious of its power and its responsibility, they have sought by simple resolution to play with the most serious things of our national life. To gain partisan ends, men of power have deliberately subverted the promptings of their souls and seared as with a white-hot iron all the dictates of heart and intellect.

"This shameful and humiliating record made in the hour of most solemn responsibility has been due to two things. First, incapacity to envision the problems, and, second, indisposition to deal with even such as they could understand.

"I charge without hesitation that the responsible party in the Congress of the United States has deliberately conspired to do nothing, to the end that the people may remain in a state of discontent, believing that to restlessness of spirit they can make successful appeal and that by discrediting the leader of Democracy they can destroy Democracy itself. They stand ready to play the desperate game and hazard the destiny of free institutions here and everywhere. Democrats will accept the issue, and we shall see to it that the people know the record and understand the reasons that underlie it.

"Our appeal is to the courage and the intelligence of women and men. Our great chieftain lies stricken in body—as much a victim of his efforts for the Nation and the world as is any soldier who bears the wounds of battle—but his vision is unclouded and his spirit is unbroken; we shall have his counsel and the benefit of his wisdom and his virtue. His fame is beyond the menace of malignancy. Already his name is written in the everlasting firmament of the earth's immortals. The inspiration of his faith and genius will be illuminating generations long centuries after his detractors shall have perished from the memories of men.

"We shall find another who will be imbued with his faith, who will be loyal to his ideals; and then we shall cast aside immaterial things that might occasion division in our ranks; will refuse to trifle with the inconsequential; will forget or disregard the matters which are petty or personal, and go forth to the supreme test in the way that beseemeth men who believe in their cause and are unafraid.

"I have here a message, addressed to myself, which reads:

"'Permit me through you to extend greetings to the loyal Democracy of Tennessee, who have been tested in war and in peace, and never in vain, and to express sincere confidence that in the struggle which is to come they will neither falter nor fail.

"'(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.'"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GILBERT A. CURRIE,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we are passing through probably the most abnormal condition this country has ever experienced. There are several factors contributing to this situation, of which the World War is the greatest. When one comprehends that in this gigantic struggle over 7,500,000 persons were killed and five times as many wounded or disabled, making a grand total in casualties of nearly 50,000,000, it is not surprising that the result should be manifested in economic conditions. Aside from the great loss in human lives, too sacred for any monetary value to be even estimated, over $186,000,000,000 in property was wasted and destroyed.

The world was engaged for over four years in an awful work of destruction. Ingenuity, man power, wealth, and everything were dedicated to the single idea of destroying the adversary. Now we find the world with a scarcity of food and clothing and with insufficient material to repair the devastation and destruction wrought by war. The demand far exceeds the supply. Generally speaking, a person who has anything to sell can demand his own price. It is a golden opportunity for the profiteer, and in many places he does not hesitate to assert his grasping, selfish power.

For a score of years statesmen have sought by legislation to prohibit combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade and have endeavored to secure for the consuming public the benefit of honest competition. These antitrust laws were very helpful in normal times, but are practically a nullity under these abnormal conditions. Combination and conspiracy to avoid competition are now unnecessary. In many lines there is no such thing as competition. There is not sufficient of the commodities to satisfy the demand, and profiteering results. How to correct these abuses by legislation has puzzled the wisest statesmen. Congress has enacted laws making profiteering a criminal act. It has appropriated millions and millions of dollars for the Department of Justice to prosecute profiteers, but without appreciable result.

For instance, I read in the newspapers a few days ago that an oil-refining company had made for the past year $178 on each $100 of its stock, yet the price of gasoline and oil goes higher and higher, and the Department of Justice seems unable, notwithstanding the law, to either punish the profiteer or check the rising price. The coal operators exerted every influence to have removed Government control and price fixing on their commodity. Yet no sooner had the Government restrictions been removed by the President than the price of coal was advanced to the public several dollars per ton. It is true that wages were increased nearly 30 per cent, but this does not warrant nor justify the present price of coal. With miners striking and insisting upon a six-hour day and a five-day week and a shortage of car supply, a restricted output is the natural result. The operator under these conditions can sell at almost any exorbitant price he may care to ask.

There is the sugar situation. My district is a great sugar-beet producing section. The Government fixed the selling price for the manufacturer at about 12½ cents per pound. The settlement was made between the companies and the beet producers on this basis substantially. The Attorney General has ruled that the broker can charge a profit of 1 cent and the ultimate retailer 2 cents per pound. Upon the statute books is a law against hoarding and profiteering, yet every housewife knows if she can buy any sugar at all she must pay over 25 cents per pound. The spirit of the law is either being evaded or violated, yet the Department of Justice, with all the law it desires, seems unable to remedy the situation.

These flagrant instances of profiteering indicate the futility of remedying this deplorable situation through legislation. The real solution is to increase production, so that the natural law of supply and demand will again apply and the consuming public receive the benefit of competition.

What hope may we have, then, for increased production? Is there any tendency in this direction? The American Federation of Labor boasts that it now has a membership of over 4,000,000 and with the railroad brotherhoods over 6,000,000. Under the present administration this membership has doubled. Have trade-union closed-shop policies increased the output per man or decreased it? Is the slogan of the leaders of organized labor to-day "Produce" or is it "Reduce"? Are strikes in factories, steel mills, coal mines, and upon the railroads conducive to increased production? Do shorter hours during these critical days, when half the world is starving, represent the millennium?

Mr. Gompers's record for strikes grows greater with each succeeding month. For the past year it is reliably estimated that striking laboring men, ofttimes out against their wish because some labor agitator has brought about a strike, lost in wages $750,000,000, costing industry $1,250,000,000, saying nothing of the loss, suffering, and inconvenience caused thereby to the general public.

It may be interesting for you to know that the switchmen's strike on the railroads caused a loss to the Government of $3,000,000 each day. Is it of no interest or concern to the public that these strikes are called? Has the public no interest or concern in preventing, for instance, a strike upon the railroads which would paralyze the traffic of the Nation, close factories, cause idleness, and in a few days bring starvation and disaster to countless thousands?

I may be pardoned for inserting here an editorial appearing in the Detroit Saturday Night of November 22, 1919, commenting upon my views on this subject:

[Editorial from Detroit Saturday Night.]

CURRIE LEADS THE WAY.

Public opinion is making itself felt in Congress. The Senate insists that strikes on railroads be made unlawful. The House is still afraid of the cars, and has so far failed to agree with the Senate. But there is hope for the House. It has at least one spokesman who sees where justice lies and has the courage to say so. To the lasting honor of Michigan be it said that that spokesman is Congressman CURRIE, of Midland. He would not only prevent strikes on the railroads, but, like Mr. Hughes, he would prevent strikes in all basic industries. He would establish an industrial court whose decisions would be binding, and would also be enforceable on recalcitrants by contempt proceedings.

This is essential. The choice is between the Hughes-Currie legislation and the chaos of a coal strike. As Dean Edwards puts it, it is no more pleasant to be frozen by a mine worker than a mine owner—and no more necessary.

My interest is in the welfare of the man who toils, and no man would be human who did not sympathize with him and stand ever ready to better his condition. Current events force me to the conclusion, however, that leaders of organized labor like Gompers and Foster are rapidly driving this country into disaster. Their policy is against the interest of the very men they profess to serve. They have blacklisted Congressmen like myself because we voted to make Government clerks work eight hours per day during the war. They insist that seven hours is all they should work. We are blacklisted because we voted for the transportation act of 1920, which recognized that the public is interested in the settlement of labor disputes arising from railroad employment. The railroad brotherhood chiefs, whose salaries are reputed to be $14,000 per year, demand that the Government shall bond itself for billions to purchase the railroads and turn them over to the employees for operation. The Plumb plan, which they advocate, provides in effect that the employees have a two-thirds control, which means complete control, in fixing their own wages and working conditions, and make the general public pay the bills. Government operation of the railroads cost the people over a billion dollars in direct loss, and it resulted in an increase of 190,000 railroad employees. After they have sovietized the railroad industry, these radical labor leaders propose to follow that scheme by taking over other essential industries—and farming is an essential industry. In Russia socialists, anarchists, and other radicals seized the farms first, but the present program of radicalism would only spare the farms to the last. For my part I shall never consent to any such socialistic scheme.

Mr. Gompers and his associates boast of their power to defeat any Congressman who dares to defy their wish in any particular. They insist that organized labor shall have a Congress that will do its bidding—they mean the bidding of a few radical trouble makers. They ask for the overturn of the courts. They would have the greatest Government on the face of the earth, established of, by, and for all the people, turned into a class Government. To this proposition I shall never subscribe.

They insist upon the right to unionize firemen and policemen of cities and their right to strike, regardless of what may happen to the people. Gompers has publicly defended the Boston police strikers who left their posts of duty and let thugs pillage, plunder, and murder the innocent and unprotected people.

When winter was setting in the coal miners went on a strike in defiance of law and refused to arbitrate their demands. Factories were closing, and thousands upon thousands of laboring men were thrown out of employment. Cold, hunger, and even death stalked everywhere, when a fearless Federal judge saved the situation. Notwithstanding this court decision, Gompers and the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor openly defied the law and pledged their resources to overcome the Government and its courts in their effort to end the strike.

My sense of public duty would not permit me to remain silent under such circumstances, which threatened the very existence of the Government. I was mindful then, as I am certain now, that this act on my part would bring upon me the wrath and merciless opposition of these radical labor agitators. It was comforting and encouraging, however, to have observed favorable comment in some of the leading papers of my State and elsewhere. The Enquirer and Evening News of Battle Creek, Mich., paid me a tribute of which I am justly proud. The following editorial appeared in its issue of November 25, 1919:

[Editorial from Battle Creek Enquirer and Evening News.]

The Hon. GILBERT A. CURRIE, Michigan Member of Congress, comes from the Bay City district, where there is considerable mining strength. It would have been quite conventional and customary for Mr. CURRIE to talk softly and sing low, and walk catwise around the labor situation and express his sympathy for everybody by wringing his hands and giving three cheers for the flag, as has been done in politics in situations of this kind before.

Mr. CURRIE, however, has talked out. He has condemned the strike. He has denounced the evasion of the court order. He has demonstrated that his patriotism is equipped with the same kind of backbone as that possessed by Gov. Coolidge and Mayor Ole Hanson, which is a kind in urgent demand at these times; so urgent, in fact, that the life of government is involved in the hunt for a patriotism which is so equipped.

Naturally, Mr. CURRIE is coming in for all the hostility with which a compact and ruthless force undertakes to intimidate those who will not buy advantage by surrendering a trust.

It remains to be seen whether Mr. CURRIE is to receive the same proofs of patriotic soundness in Michigan that were given to Gov. Coolidge in Massachusetts. Speaking in the House on these matters recently, Mr. CURRIE said:

"I am fully conscious that for Members of Congress to unflinchingly perform their duty to the public means in some cases banishment from public life. Personally, I would rather a thousand times over be retired to private life conscious that I had tried to squarely meet the issue than to be returned to Congress and know that at the critical time in the Nation's history I had been a party to surrendering the public interests and welfare into the hands of any organization. The right will prevail; free government will survive. I have an abiding faith in the intelligence of the American people. Thank God, these leaders do not represent unorganized labor nor reflect its sentiment. They do not reflect the sentiment of the rank and file of even organized American labor."

It is about time for Congress to realize that there are other interests entitled to recognition and a helping hand. It is a matter of common knowledge that thousands upon thousands of farms are idle this year because it is impossible to secure labor in competition with the factories of the cities. While Gompers and his closed-shop policy have constantly reduced production, the farmer has made a superhuman effort to increase production and feed the world. He has struggled along in an individual way. Combinations have told him what he must pay for his necessaries, his implements, and everything needed upon the farm, and when he takes his crops to market he has often been obliged to accept what other combinations have been willing to offer. I am pleased that the House of Representatives during this very week has passed a bill authorizing the association of producers of agricultural products. This measure has been urged by farm bureaus, the National Grange, Gleaners, and other progressive farm organizations. It is a step in the right direction. I am proud to have been a member of the committee which prepared and favorably reported this bill. Congress could do nothing more beneficial to the interests of the entire country and for the security of the Nation than to encourage the tillers of the soil. Down through all the ages and in every land the farmers have been the great stabilizing influence for national security and existence.

There are other ways in which the farmers can be encouraged. It is common knowledge that the importation of oriental beans is practically ruining this industry in the United States. I represent one of the greatest bean-producing sections in the country and understand this situation. Cheap Japanese labor enables that country to raise beans, export to the United States, and sell in ruinous competition with our product. It is un-American to let this condition longer remain. Notwithstanding the price of practically every other commodity has greatly increased, beans sell for less to-day than they did three years ago. No tariff bill has passed this Congress, but I hope that one of the first to receive favorable consideration will be the Osborne bill repealing the sections of the act of 1913 which reduced the tariff on beans and peas.

Merchant Marine Bill of 1920.

OF

HON. GEORGE W. EDMONDS,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up very extensively the administrative features of this bill. It is sufficient to say that this bill arranges for a new Shipping Board to be composed of seven members to whom are delegated all the powers given to the original board and to whom all property having to do with shipping acquired by the President through this or other departments, including port facilities, are to be transferred to for operation. Arrangements are made for correlation between the departments who have to do with matters affecting shipping interests, so that there will be no conflict of authority to prevent our building up and keeping upon the seas a merchant marine. It also arranges for the board to assist in the building of special ships by advancing upon mortgage two-thirds of the value of such ships. This sum is $25,000,000 to be taken out of the sales and operating profits annually for five years. As these ships are apt to cost $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, this sum, together with money invested by private parties in their construction, should build about eight ships annually. This will tend to the rounding out of our merchant marine that has been spoken off so often as necessary to its fulfilling the expectations of the American public.

In the original shipping act it was required that any corporation, partnership, or association should not be deemed a citizen of the United States unless a controlling interest was owned by citizens of the United States and unless its president and managing directors are citizens of the United States and the corporation itself incorporated under the laws of the United States, Territory, District, or possession thereof. In the foreign trade this definition has been left as it is, but in the coastwise trade the bill calls for 75 per cent ownership instead of the controlling interest mentioned. It was deemed advisable that with the protection given the coastwise trade there should be required as nearly as possible American ownership. Numerous arguments have been advanced that in the coastwise trade 100 per cent American ownership should be required. Such a condition is hardly possible when it is realized that should in any manner one share of stock of this corporation be placed in the hands of a foreigner the corporation could be blackmailed out of business. To place such power in the hands of our foreign competitors would be the height of folly on our part, and it would lead to nothing but destruction of a splendid coastwise line of which we have been justly so proud.

In the foreign trade, however, a different condition exists. Many lines operating to foreign countries would be greatly strengthened and their business stimulated if it were possible to secure from the citizens of the country to which a line operates the purchase of an interest in the line. Such a line is the China Mail Line, the ownership of which is 60 per cent American and 40 per cent Chinese. It is perfectly clear that the residents of these countries will use such a line as far as possible, as they are interested in it, and such divided ownership would lead to great benefit in making our shipping successful.

The transfer of the wharf facilities acquired by the various departments, not for sale but for use of the Shipping Board, will place in their hands many fine wharves and warehouses to use to assist in building up American lines. They will also be held in reserve in case of future wars for use by the other departments of the Government. The investigation of the port facilities in cooperation with the Secretary of War should tend to assist in removing the inefficiency which now exists in some, I regret to say most, of our ports.

Full liberty is given the board to establish, either through sale or charter or by direct operation, lines if it is proven to them that there is a valid demand for these lines and evidence presented to them that these lines will be successful. It is not intended, however, that the board should use this authority to drive established lines, operated by citizens of the United States, out of business, particularly where the service of these lines is being fairly conducted. It has been stated that this would prevent competition, but the original shipping act, which is still in existence and under which the board operates, has such supervisory and restrictive powers that the board has full authority to prevent any unfair discrimination that might be attempted.

SALE OF VESSELS.

Government ownership and operation—it was proven conclusively by our investigation that it has not shown a fair financial return in any way. Nor does our system of Government tend toward economical operation, and in all probability it never will. It is questionable whether the operation of these ships by the Shipping Board has not been attended by a considerable loss even with the existing high rates of freight that prevailed during their operation. Many reasons contributed toward this, but since the armistice has been declared there has been very little, if any, improvement in the returns from these ships. As a result, it was decided that it was better to make the sale of these ships as attractive as possible, amortizing the war cost and marking them at the reproduction cost, taking all other conditions into consideration, including depreciation for age. It was provided that they should be sold at public or private competitive sale, after appraisement and due advertisement. This will give all interests a fair opportunity to purchase the ships and prevent any favoritism in their disposal.

All sales made by the board shall be subject to section 9 of the shipping act, which requires under penalty that it shall be unlawful to sell, transfer, or mortgage, or, except under regulations prescribed by the board, to charter any vessel purchased from the board or documented under the laws of the United States to any person not a citizen of the United States, or to put the same under a foreign registry or flag, without first obtaining the board's approval. In the sale of vessels to aliens it is required that the ships shall first be offered to American citizens, and that five out of the seven members of the board shall consent to the sale, and that they shall place in their records a full statement of the reason for making such sale. In this connection I would like to state that there are many ships of a type for which it will be impossible to find a use in our trade. Such ships should be disposed of while it is possible to find some trade in which they can be utilized, even if they are disposed of to aliens; it is questionable even to-day if our fleet of vessels hardly off the ways will be found to be as economical as the new Diesel engine ships that are now being constructed in foreign countries. Of ships being built to-day it will be found that many of them of the largest size are being constructed with these engines. Their use gives an economy of space amounting to 15 or 20 per cent of the cargo-carrying capacity of the ship, and the engine-room working force is reduced almost two-thirds. Such is the economy of this class of vessel that it is only by the most careful management that the oil and coal burning ships that we have been constructing will be able to compete. It is unfortunate that the Shipping Board did not enter more largely into the construction of this type of vessel, particularly after the armistice was declared. In my opinion, it is just as well to as rapidly as possible utilize or dispose of the ships we have on hand to-day, and in all new construction endeavor to prepare for the competition that must come from these vessels.

It is arranged that until sold all vessels under control of the board shall be managed and operated by it or chartered and leased by it, and ample authority is given to the board to carry out this section of the act.

Ample powers are given to the board in this and the original shipping act for supervising all matters in connection with the American merchant marine preventing unfair and unjust discrimination, and it should be the policy to return the board as quickly as possible to its proper functions and remove from it the necessity of operating or handling vessels. It is not good judgment to have a supervisory board such as this is operating in the lines of business over which it exercises its supervision.

INSURANCE.

It has been found after careful investigation that one of the important features in building up the merchant marine was insurance and that, owing to the number of years that we have been without a merchant marine, this facility had become so little used in this country that two-thirds of our marine insurance was being written in foreign companies. The information to be conveyed through this facility is exceedingly detrimental toward building up a merchant marine, and it was decided that at least a majority of this insurance should be written in this country, and by bringing together the insurance companies the Shipping Board has been enabled to make an arrangement for reinsuring, so that it is possible to take care of this insurance. Further than that, the interests of the Shipping Board and the insurance companies being identical, it is advantageous to both to minimize loss. The Shipping Board and the insurance companies have arranged for an American salvage service, which will eventually serve our merchant marine not only in the ports of the United States, but in all the ports of the world. This is decidedly advantageous and should result in a reduction in insurance rates, particularly if insurance departments of all the States join in helping this move along. The bill calls for the removal from the penalties of the antitrust laws of insurance combinations of this character in marine insurance only. It is very doubtful whether the antitrust laws affect the insurance, anyway, as insurance is a service, although it might possibly be construed in marine matters as being a necessity. This section of the bill, however, would remove any doubt on the subject, and undoubtedly many favorable arrangements will be made under the section.

MORTGAGE LAW.

The mortgage law as written in the bill has been the result of several months' work between the committee and admiralty lawyers, before whom the matter had been placed. If it is the desire of the American people to invest in shipping mortgages and the bonds issued under them, these mortgages must of necessity be placed in such position as to cause them to be looked upon favorably by the banking houses, trust companies, and investors. The bill arranges for two classes of mortgages; one is the old mortgage arrangement which has been in existence for some years and the second is a mortgage with a preferred status. Undoubtedly the larger companies, operating a large number of vessels upon which there is a blanket mortgage, will prefer the old style of mortgage. The preferred mortgage, however, will give the smaller operator an opportunity to raise capital upon his ships for the conduct of his business. After hearing all parties interested, the form of the bill as passed by Congress was agreed upon and, we trust, will operate satisfactorily.

AMERICAN BUREAU OF SHIPPING.

Considerable comment has been made regarding the recognition by Congress of the American Bureau of Shipping for classification purposes. It has been stated, but not correctly, that this act requires all documented or enrolled vessels of the United States to be classified in an American bureau. Only vessels owned by the United States Government are required to be so classified, the idea being to build up a classification bureau of our own, just as several of the European Governments have built up similar bureaus, and to give it some official recognition, so that the Government can require for our bureau such recognition as is given by us to foreign classification societies, or as exist between foreign countries. The functions of the classification society are well established, and in the hands of a competitor have been used in the past and can be used in the future to the detriment of the upbuilding of a merchant marine in any country. If we expect to remain in the carrying business, we must expect to build up our own facilities, of which a classification society is of vital importance.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS IN THE ACT—IMPORT AND EXPORT FREIGHT RATES.

This section provides that the benefit of the special import and export freight rates which are now existent or may be promulgated in the future shall be only applicable to American ships unless the service can not be properly handled by American ships. There is nothing unusual in the use of these special freight rates in building up a merchant marine. Up to the time of the war, and probably to-day, special rates are given to German ships and German merchants. This method has been used by most foreign countries to upbuild their merchant marine. In view of the many discriminations that foreign countries are now imposing upon us for the benefit of their own trade, such as discriminatory export duties made higher to other countries than between their own, there is no good reason why we should not answer with some discriminations in favor of our ships. It has been stated that this might occasion retaliatory measures. I contend that it is a retaliatory measure on our part for discriminations that are being made to-day against us.

POSTAL SUBVENTION.

Almost since the time of the establishment of the Postal Service it has been customary to use the postal subvention as a means for building up steamship service to foreign ports. This was recognized by the ocean mail act of 1891, but unfortunately the speed provisions in that act did not assist in profitable operation at the rate named as a subvention. There is nothing in this act that in any way prevents the act of 1891 still being operative, but this act gives to the board, together with the Postmaster General, supervision over such lines as may be established through the intervention of the board where it may be advantageous to use the postal subvention to aid in its successful operation. The board and the Postmaster General are, of course, limited by the amounts appropriated to them annually by Congress.

DISCRIMINATORY CUSTOMS DUTIES.

This arranges in the act to abrogate all treaties which prevent our utilizing discriminatory duties in order to build up for American vessels return cargoes which are so necessary when things return to normal for the successful operation of these ships. As these treaties become abrogated, the 10 per cent ad valorem duty required by the Underwood Tariff Act on goods shipped in foreign ships will become effective. Surely such an advantage to American ships will attract the exporters and will result in the use of our ships. The figures of shipping tonnage in the United States shows that after the abrogation of the discriminatory tonnage dues and tariff duties the carrying of goods in American bottoms rapidly declined, and it is probable that this and the preferential freight rate on our railroads will be able to assist in building up our merchant marine without subsidy more than could be conceived of by any other measure. Comment has been made that this might lead to retaliatory measures by foreign powers. The answer to this is that, having discriminated against us as far as they can in many different ways, they have invited such measures of reprisal on our part.

TAXES.

There is nothing new in the release of taxes on shipping by many countries. The release from taxation in this bill is only made upon condition that the money so realized is placed in new ship construction. This is, of course, a discrimination which might seem unfair and yet at the same time will decidedly stimulate building of the special ships desired to round out our merchant fleet. Many nations have from time to time and some even to-day are giving financial assistance to their shipbuilders building merchant vessels. Without being a direct charge upon the Government the same is accomplished by this reservation of taxes and should be beneficial.

There are many other minor matters of administration and advantage in the bill which I will not describe at this time. I am convinced after eight years of study of this subject upon the Merchant Marine Committee of the House, during which we investigated the merchant shipping of the world and have had many different subjects brought to our attention, that his bill is one of the most advanced and constructive measures ever passed by the Congress of the United States to assist in building up the shipping industry. Of course, it will take years to know what the result will be. The United States is a great exporting country for raw materials. There is very little that it is necessary for it to have from other countries that can not be supplied to it from points in the Western Hemisphere. If a fair trade balance is to be maintained by this country with other countries, we should at least do 50 per cent or more of our carrying trade. With our carrying trade in the hands of other countries the invisible costs of that carrying aid in reducing the visible balance of trade. It is stated that in 1919, with an adverse balance of $3,346,000.000, Great Britain had an invisible revenue from shipping, banking profits, and foreign investments of $2,850,000,000, so that upon the figures furnished me this enormous adverse balance of over $3,000,000,000 was reduced to less than $500,000,000. It will thus be seen that if we desire to receive the benefits of our own labor it is exceedingly necessary that we supply and profit from all the sources that enter into our foreign business. When we were carrying only 7 to 9 per cent of our imports and exports, we were paying $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 a year interest to foreign investors while ostensibly the figures showed a decided balance of trade in our favor. This condition on account of the war is now reversed, and if we desire to retain our proper place among the nations of the earth we must use every endeavor to secure our proper share of the marketing of our products.

OF

HON. HENRY D. FLOOD,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to print granted to me by the House, I include herewith a statement of the Secretary of Agriculture showing the effect of reduced appropriations by Congress on the activities of the Department of Agriculture:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
June 5, 1920.

The Agricultural appropriation bill for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1920, as recently passed by Congress, carries approximately $6,000,000 less than the estimates made by the department as to its needs and $2,185,000 less than the amount provided in the appropriation act for the current fiscal year. Although the effect of reduced funds on the work of the department was laid fully before Congress while the bill was under consideration, this serious reduction has been made apparently on the ground of economy. I do not believe it is real economy, however, because it will certainly hamper the department in its efforts to aid the farmers of the country in doing their work of feeding and clothing the people and will also handicap the department in administering some of the important regulatory laws intrusted to it for enforcement. The projects or activities to be curtailed or discontinued, in so far as the department has any discretion in the matter, have been determined only after a very thorough and careful review of the whole situation, taking all the factors into consideration.

There is a reduction of $304,000 in the appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry as a whole, and this will affect many important lines of work. For example, we have this year $446,865 for field work in connection with the eradication of hog cholera. The amount appropriated for next year is only $192,200. There was a time when the annual losses of hogs from this disease amounted to 144 head to the thousand. Since the eradication campaign was launched, however, the losses have never exceeded 67, and they have been as low as 42 per thousand. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that the eradication work is saving farmers of the United States $40,000,000 a year.

With the money appropriated for hog-cholera eradication, the department has been carrying on work in 36 of the principal hog-raising States. The specialists in the field have been directing their efforts both to treating hogs and to demonstrating to veterinary practitioners, farmers, and others the proper method of determining when hogs have cholera and of giving them the proper treatment. They have also been showing farmers, by demonstrations, lectures, and personal interviews on the farm, how they may protect themselves from losses from the disease. With the reduced appropriation only about one-third as much work can be done next year as has been done heretofore.

MUST ABANDON WORK IN MANY STATES.

The eradication work, so far as Federal assistance is concerned, will have to be completely abandoned in several States. The force of men in the field helping farmers to save their hogs from cholera will have to be reduced from 140 to about 54. The large hog-producing States which now have from five to eight Federal hog-cholera specialists will henceforth have not more than two or three and many of them only one.

The cooperation that has been established through a period of years between the Federal Department of Agriculture and State officials will have to be abandoned in many cases, which simply means that the machinery for hog-cholera control built up by patient work of years will be disrupted.

The appropriation for the investigation of animal diseases has been reduced by $14,400. One of the results will be the abandonment in New York and Texas of cooperative work looking to the control of contagious abortion of cattle. Work on other diseases will be generally curtailed, although it is impossible now to indicate the specific localities that will be affected. Among the studies that will be reduced are those on stock poisoning by plants, anthrax, tuberculosis, roundworms of sheep, internal parasites, cattle ticks, mange mites, and other external parasites. These studies are now being conducted by the branch of the department that made the fundamental discovery relating to the cattle tick which causes Texas fever, perfected the vaccine cure for blackleg, discovered the cause of hog cholera and the method of prevention, and worked out the formula for arsenical dip in eradicating cattle ticks.

DAIRY INVESTIGATIONS CURTAILED.

The appropriation for dairy investigations has been reduced by $12,750. That appears to be a small sum, nevertheless we are accomplishing a great deal with it, and the reduction will make it necessary for the department to abandon its cow-testing work in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Connecticut.

It must discontinue, also, the work it now has under way to improve the quality and increase the use of dairy products in the States of Iowa, Kansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. It will have to withdraw from the cooperative dairy extension work in Nevada and Wyoming. Cow testing and the other lines of work that will have to be abandoned have enabled farmers in all these States to save considerable sums by pointing out the importance of eliminating the cows that do not pay for their keep and of generally improving the quality of dairy cows. As a result of the discontinuance of the work, the farmers in the States affected will probably lose this year many times $12,750, and so will the farmers of other States into which the department would have sent its trained cow-testing association experts during the next fiscal year if Congress had appropriated the same amount of money that is available this year.

About one farm in six in the United States has no milk cows. Other farms that keep some milk cows dispose of all the dairy products. The families living on these two classes of farms thus are deprived of a much-needed food. The Department of Agriculture has been conducting a campaign to emphasize the importance of maintaining family cows on farms, has been demonstrating the making of a good quality of farm butter, and, in some sections, the work has resulted in the placing of family cows on a large number of farms, thus providing much-needed food for those families. Only a very small portion of the large field has been covered. We had planned to extend it until we had covered all the territory, but this work, too, must be discontinued.

DISCONTINUE WORK IN TICK-FREE AREAS.

The Department of Agriculture has eradicated the cattle-fever tick from approximately 70 per cent of the territory that it formerly occupied. It was felt that the Government should not leave the area freed of this pest to haphazard live-stock development, but that it should follow up the tick eradication with an educational campaign to help the people to profitable cattle production. We now have a fund of $50,000 for that work. Half of it is devoted to dairy extension, assisting farmers in improving their methods of feeding, furnishing plans of dairy buildings and silos, giving instructions in the raising of calves, and aiding in the purchase of dairy cattle.

The other half is used for demonstrations in general live-stock production. The result has been the establishment of a dairy industry along the best lines in the areas freed from ticks and a steady increase in the number of beef cattle.

Congress did not appropriate anything at all for that work next year. Therefore, all Federal activities along the specialized line of live-stock production demonstrations in tick-free territory will cease, and beef-cattle specialists will be dispensed with in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. Dairy specialists also will be dispensed with in North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, and Oklahoma.

The Southern States have demonstrated their ability to breed, feed, and produce cattle that, in many instances, have carried off the sweepstakes at our International Live Stock Exposition at Chicago and other stock shows. Therefore the live-stock industry of the South should, by all means, be encouraged and supported in every way possible.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE FUND SMALL.

Congress has reduced the appropriation for combating foot-and-mouth disease by $950,000—from $1,500,000 to $550,000. Foot-and-mouth disease is one of the most destructive live-stock scourges known to veterinary science. It has six times made its appearance in the United States, but we have always been able to stamp it out. It exists in many of the European countries, and is likely to appear here again at any time. If it does appear, the eradication work will have to be very prompt and very thorough or the disease will get out of hand and cause enormous losses. Of the appropriation that we have had in the past $1,000,000 is merely an insurance fund. It can not be used except in case of an actual outbreak of the disease. Practically all of this sum is eliminated by the reduction. The funds provided in the new bill will be insufficient to cope with any extended outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease and if one should occur when Congress is not in session there would be no quick means of getting the money that may be needed to protect the country.

CEREAL FIELD STATIONS TO BE CLOSED.

The funds provided for the Bureau of Plant Industry are approximately $375,000 less than the amount appropriated this year. The appropriation for cereal investigations, for example, has been reduced by $80,000. That means, first of all, that the field stations for carrying on this work will have to be closed in North Carolina and Tennessee; at Amarillo, Tex.; Archer, Wyo.; at Highmore and Brookings, S. Dak.; Nephi, Utah, Burns, Oreg.; and Lind, Wash. This is in addition to cereal field work that has already been discontinued at Williston, N. Dak., and Newell, S. Dak., because of the impossibility of continuing it under present high prices with the already inadequate appropriation.

All these stations have been built up during a number of years to carry on experiments with new varieties and methods of cultivation. They have given the farmers that they serve improved varieties and have developed for them cultural methods designed to produce the best yields.

Pathological work on cereals must be reduced. Stem rust investigations must be discontinued at Ithaca, N. Y.; Lansing, Mich.; Auburn, Ala.; Tucson, Ariz.; and Corvallis, Oreg. Cereal disease investigations along various lines, while they will not be entirely discontinued, must be reduced at Berkeley, Calif.; Milford, Conn.; Bloomington, Ill.; LaFayette, Ind.; Ames, Iowa; Manhattan, Kans.; Crowley, La.; St. Paul, Minn.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Fargo, N. Dak.; Hershey, Pa.; Knoxville, Tenn.; Arlington, Va.; Pullman, Wash.; and Madison, Wis.

CEREAL DISEASE WORK AFFECTED.

The extremely important studies that are being conducted on flax diseases, rice diseases, oriental downy mildew of corn, stripe and blotch disease of barley, soil-infesting rots of corn roots, stalks, and ears, and wheat scab will be greatly reduced, and investigations of many less important diseases will be practically discontinued. I will give just one illustration of what these cereal disease investigations mean. During the past two years our specialists have discovered that corn root rot and wheat scab are caused by the same fungus; that corn rot causes many missing hills and barren stalks; that it sometimes causes early ripening of apparently sound, but really diseased, ears which, because they are early, are saved for seed. Then they have shown that it is possible to detect the disease-carrying kernels by germination tests and so prevent the use of infested ears for seed. They discovered, also, that this same fungus is responsible for part of the heavy spoilage of canned corn known to commercial canners as "blacks," and they have shown how this loss may be prevented by testing sweet corn seed on the germinator and rejecting the diseased ears. This is only one among hundreds of lines of work carried on at these stations which must be abandoned or curtailed.

The appropriation for western irrigation agriculture has been reduced by $20,000. That means, first of all, that the department will have to abandon its stations at San Antonio, Tex.; on the Umatilla reclamation project, Oregon; and on the Newlands reclamation project, Nevada. These stations have been of great benefit to farmers on irrigation projects in the working out of methods for the most satisfactory crop production under the varying conditions of the different projects. Closing them means the loss of the trained men who have been operating them and of the increasingly valuable information secured from their work.

This work was undertaken as a matter of simple justice to the farmers who had settled on the irrigation projects. The irrigated lands include something over 15,000,000 acres. One and one-half million acres are included in projects in which the Government has already invested more than $100,000,000 in construction work. The settlers are undertaking to repay that money to the Government. The stations that we now have to discontinue have been equipped gradually to provide facilities for making the irrigated farms profitable to the settlers, who could then repay the Government for the money it has spent.

DRUG CROP PRODUCTION WORK CURTAILED.

The appropriation for drug, poisonous, and oil plant investigations is $20,000 less than the amount provided this year. Just a word about what we are doing with that appropriation. Camphor, for instance, is extensively used in medicine and is indispensable in the celluloid industry. The world supply of camphor is controlled by the Japanese camphor monopoly.

We have undertaken to develop an American source of supply, and large plantings of camphor have been made in Florida, but to establish the industry on a permanent basis it is necessary to continue our efforts a few years longer. Belladona, digitalis, and cannabis are indispensable in treating many serious ailments. The supply has ordinarily come from other countries, but when the war shut off the imports of drugs from abroad the crisis was promptly met by increased production of these crops at home. That was possible only because of the department's investigations and introductions of drug plants. All that work will be seriously hampered because of the small amount of money provided for its prosecution next year. We shall have to abandon our cooperative work in the development of drug crops. Poisonous plant surveys on the western stock ranges and in the national forests also will have to be largely discontinued, little further work can be done on vegetable oil crop investigations, and the camphor project will have to be reduced by 75 per cent.

The appropriation of $32,500 for biophysical investigations has been completely eliminated. That was the money with which we financed the investigations of the problems of temperature, moisture, soil, air, and other physical factors in relation to plant growth. The entire work must be discontinued, and the results of years of careful study on fundamentally important problems will be lost.

FOOD AND DRUG INSPECTION REDUCED.

The appropriation for enforcing the food and drugs act has been reduced by $30,000. Even with the present appropriation, the department has been able to maintain the enforcement of that important law only with great difficulty and through the practice of the most rigid economy. With the reduced amount provided for next year and constantly increasing costs of operation it will be necessary to cut down the force to such a point that the food and drugs consumed by the people of this country can not be safeguarded with the usual measure of thoroughness. This situation arises at a time when there is the greatest need for unusual care in the inspection of food and drugs. The high prices of materials constitute a temptation to manufacturers to adulterate their products. As a result of decreased appropriations for the maintenance of the necessary inspection service, adulterated products, both imported and home manufactured, will find easier access to the tables and homes of the Nation than they have found since the enactment of this law.

DYE INVESTIGATIONS CUT 30 PER CENT.

The appropriation for color investigations in the Bureau of Chemistry has been reduced by $30,020, or more than 30 per cent below the funds available this year. When the World War began the United States was practically dependent upon Germany and Austria for its dyestuffs. The color laboratory a few years ago began investigations which are rapidly putting this country on a self-sustaining basis in the dye industry and which have already resulted in the granting of 16 patents. One achievement will serve to illustrate the importance of the work. Phthalic anhydride is used in the preparation of more than 300 chemicals, many of them of great commercial importance. Germany had enjoyed a practical monopoly on it and at one time it sold as high as $7 a pound. The work of the color laboratory has made possible the manufacture of the product in the United States at 45 cents a pound. American manufacturers are turning out enough of the material to take care of all domestic needs and are supplying Switzerland and some other foreign countries in direct competition with Germany. This alone has enabled the American manufacturers to start a new industry, and it has already more than returned all the money appropriated for the color laboratory since it was first organized; and yet it represents only one line of work of the laboratory. There are 15 other lines that have resulted in important developments.

The appropriation for investigating the handling and transportation of poultry, eggs, and fish has been reduced by $10,000. That work has been yielding results worth to the country every year many times the amount of the whole appropriation. The breakage of eggs in transit formerly was so great that the railroads claimed they were handling eggs at a loss. Now, packing and shipping methods have been devised by which breakage can be reduced to little or nothing. These methods, however, are not yet in general application, and there is need for extending the work to various sections of the country. Methods have been developed for preventing the spoilage of poultry in transit, and means have been devised for shipping fresh fish in good condition to inland cities which previously could not obtain them. We had planned to extend these three lines of work to sections of the country not yet reached, but this can not be done with the reduced appropriation.

FOREST EXPERIMENT STATIONS CLOSED.

The appropriation for forest investigations has been reduced by $28,728. Here are some of the things the country will lose as the result: It will lose at least three of the four forest experiment stations on the western national forests, located at Priest River, Idaho; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Flagstaff, Ariz.; and Stabler, Wash. Much of the work dealing with maintaining and reproducing the forests in the East and South, where the problem of forest devastation and future timber supply is most acute, will have to be abandoned. Nothing whatever can be done in the Lake States or in the Northeast.

Hardly a start can be made on urgent problems connected with the rapidly waning supply of hardwoods in the Central States and the Appalachian regions. Studies of the growth, yield, and future use of the vast areas of yellow-pine lands in the South will have to be abandoned. Little progress can be made in the general survey of national forest resources and in studying the economic problems inseparably connected with the development of a comprehensive forest policy.

CROP ESTIMATE PROJECTS TO BE DISCONTINUED.

The appropriation for the Bureau of Crop Estimates has been reduced by about $53,000. This means the discontinuance of all special service except the regular monthly crop reports on acreage, condition, and production of staple crops. It means that the services of crop reporting specialists on cotton, tobacco, and rice will have to be dispensed with—and these three crops last year had a farm value of nearly $3,000,000,000. Loss of the rice specialists will directly affect the farmers in the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, South Carolina, and California. The value of the work of the tobacco specialists, which will be discontinued, is well known to the farmers of Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Maryland, and Georgia. Through the loss of the cotton specialists all the cotton-growing States will be affected. Special estimates on the commercial production of fruit and truck crops, which had a farm value last year of nearly $500,000,000, will have to be discontinued. The commercial apple estimates are said to have been worth at least $1,000,000 to the apple growers alone last season; and the estimates of the commercial surplus production of potatoes are reported to have been worth more than $100,000 to the growers of a single county in Minnesota last season.

PINK BOLLWORM FUND REDUCED.

The appropriation for the eradication of the pink bollworm of cotton has been reduced by $100,000. The pink bollworm possibly is the most destructive enemy of cotton in the world. It has inflicted tremendous damage to every cotton-producing country on the globe, with the exception of the United States. It is present in this country in a few counties in Texas and in three parishes in Louisiana. With the full cooperation of the States concerned, the opportunity now exists to eradicate it. If it is not eradicated now, it will inevitably spread over all the cotton-growing territory in the United States and will undoubtedly cause enormous losses.

The Department of Agriculture is pursuing the only program that promises success. The work is already well under way and the prospects for complete eradication are distinctly favorable. Half-way measures will almost certainly mean money and work wasted. Such work can not be adjusted so that it will cost a fixed sum. It must be maintained on a basis which will insure the accomplishment of the end aimed at. It is like fire control or the maintenance of levees. It can not be dropped and later taken up again. As soon as vigilance is relaxed the opportunity for control is lost. The reduction in the appropriation will make it impossible for the department to prosecute its efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm on the scale which the experts think necessary in order to insure success.

MUST DISCONTINUE MANY MARKETING PROJECTS.

The appropriation for the Bureau of Markets has been reduced by approximately $270,000. The funds for its investigational work, for example, are $30,000 less than the amount provided this year. One of the results of this decrease will be that the project which has to do with the marketing and distribution of farm products in cities will have to be discontinued. This work has resulted in many improvements in marketing conditions and has benefited the consumer as well as the producer. Among the cities in which this project has rendered assistance in improving market conditions are Chicago, Cleveland, Akron, Colorado Springs, Denver, Detroit, Indianapolis, Jacksonville, Key West, Richmond, Lynchburg, Memphis, Milwaukee, Miami, Pittsburgh, Oil City, Salt Lake City, Toledo, St. Augustine, and Wilkes-Barre.

It will be necessary to discontinue all the work relating to the direct marketing of farm products by parcel post, express, and otherwise. This work has brought to light very useful information, and only through investigations of this sort is it possible to find a market outlet for much food which is not produced in sufficient quantities to be marketed in car lots and which otherwise may go to waste.

MARKET NEWS SERVICES CURTAILED.

The appropriation for the market news services on fruits and vegetables and on live stock and meats has been reduced by $58,680. These services have been indorsed by a large number of representative argricultural associations and by thousands of individual producers, commercial firms, and others. To conduct them properly the department formerly had 17,000 miles of leased wire in operation. On account of decreased funds, its wire mileage already has been cut to about 5,000, and must be still further reduced under the limited appropriation. The Pacific coast, the intermountain region, the South, and Southwest, which during the past year have been largely deprived of the benefits of the news services, have suffered further reductions in the last month. This is particularly unfortunate, since all these sections, relatively remote from markets, are in urgent need of accurate and dependable market information.

The service rendered the public from most of the large market centers, especially Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Omaha, and Minneapolis, must be curtailed to such an extent that wide dissemination of information regarding market demands, supplies, and prices will be impossible. Forced consolidation of present leased-wire facilities will result in confusion and delay on account of congested wires. It will be necessary to eliminate all live-stock market messages during the forenoon to eastern points on the leased wire from the Kansas City, Omaha, and East St. Louis markets; and it will be necessary also to delay, until the day's trading has commenced, the transmission to the great live-stock markets of the West of all reports of prices in the eastern wholesale dressed-meat markets.

We have just had to close the office at San Francisco which furnished market news on fruits and vegetables, and, within a few months, will have to discontinue the issuance of market reports on dairy products at Minneapolis and San Francisco. For practical purposes, this will deprive the Pacific coast of the services on dairy products and fruits and vegetables, and it will greatly delay the dairy service to the important dairy sections now served from Minneapolis. One or two temporary offices will be open on the Pacific coast to render a service on special crops during the heavy crop movement; but, as stated, the reduced funds have compelled the virtual elimination of an all-the-year-round service in this region.

REDUCTION IN FOOD-PRODUCTS INSPECTION SERVICE.

The food-products inspection service, during the few years it has been in operation, has prevented the loss of thousands of dollars to the producer. It has practically eliminated the commission man in the important markets who used to buy on a gamble and then reject the shipment if prices declined before it was received. It has made it possible for shippers and other interested parties to obtain reliable reports on the condition of their products when received in the markets. Terms and conditions of sale are stated with greater clearness and precision. The chances of misunderstanding are reduced, and the reports indicate to the shipper whether or not the stock was correctly graded, packed, and labeled. The service facilitates the distribution of farm products, hastens the release of cars, and prevents deterioration and waste caused by the delays incident to disputes.

There is urgent need for the expansion of this service; but, with the reduced appropriation, not only is expansion impossible but retrenchment is unavoidable. Butter-inspection work can be conducted in only four of the large markets, and the inspection of certain other commodities specified in the law, such as hay, can not be handled at all. We had expected to establish offices for the inspection of fruits and vegetables in such cities as Hartford, Conn.; Louisville, Ky.; and Norfolk, Va.; but this can not now be done. It should be borne in mind, in this connection, that the food-products-inspection service at the present rate of progress will collect in fees this year about $58,000, which will be turned into the Treasury.

COOPERATIVE MARKETING WORK CAN NOT BE EXTENDED.

Through the cooperative employment of field agents in various States, important progress has been made in developing broad, consistent marketing policies. Without assistance in coordinating the activities of the various agencies, each State will undoubtedly develop its marketing work in a different way, and confusion and waste will be inevitable. The study of marketing problems on a comprehensive scale was undertaken so recently, and authoritative information is consequently so meager, that it is particularly important to give State agencies the benefit of such conclusions as have been reached by the department and such States as have undertaken work along these lines; otherwise, they can not avoid costly mistakes and loss of time. We are at present cooperating with 28 States and had expected to extend the work to the other States.

The appropriation for this work, however, has been reduced by $6,650, and its expansion, which seems so essential at the present time, will have to be postponed until funds are available.

CURTAIL GRAIN STANDARDS WORK.

The Department of Agriculture is charged with the duty of enforcing the United States grain standards act. The appropriation for this purpose will be reduced by nearly $50,000 on July 1, although it is now barely sufficient to enable the department to carry on the work in the most satisfactory way. This legislation, being mandatory and not permissive, imposes upon the department certain duties which it can not avoid, and the decrease of already inadequate funds necessarily embarrasses the department and makes it difficult to enforce the law in the constructive manner which the public has every right to expect. To carry out the provisions of the grain standards act it is necessary, of course, to maintain an organization covering the entire United States. This requires the maintenance of a relatively large number of branch offices, and these in the larger markets must be manned by forces sufficiently large to handle effectively and expeditiously the great volume of work which arises automatically through the operation of the law. Measures will, of course, be taken to execute as much of the work as possible with the decreased funds, but in order to come within the appropriation we shall have to discontinue two field stations, i. e., Salt Lake City, Utah, and Cleveland, Ohio. In fact, the Salt Lake City office was closed March 31, 1920, in anticipation of the reduction in funds, and the Cleveland office was closed on May 31. Urgent appeals have been received to reinstate the work in Salt Lake City, but the reduction in funds absolutely precludes such action. The staff at Boston, Mass., must be reduced. It is highly desirable to maintain the force at its present strength, but this can not be done with reduced funds. It will be necessary to postpone for at least one year the promulgation of standards for milled rice. There is insistent demand for the standardization of additional cereals under the grain standards act, and arrangements had been made to promulgate rice standards before it became clear that the appropriation would be reduced. In fact, tentative standards were announced in February, and hearings regarding them were held in March of this year. Promulgation of the standards must now be deferred until such time as an adequate appropriation is made available for their effective enforcement.

The appropriation for surveying soils, so that the farmers of the country may know the character of the soil on their farms and that the department and State colleges may be in position to help them in solving their soil problems, has been reduced by $17,500.

FOREST-INSECT CONTROL AFFECTED.

The funds available to the Bureau of Entomology for combating insect pests have been curtailed by $247,000. The amount provided for forest-insect investigations, for example, is $7,590 less than the sum appropriated this year. This will make it necessary, first of all, to abandon the field stations at Colorado Springs, Colo., and Ashland, Oreg., and the substation at Chico, Calif., and also to reduce the work at the field laboratory at Los Gates, Calif. All work in the northwestern United States on the investigation of insects injurious to forests, forest products, and shade trees will be discontinued. Work in the Southeastern States relating to insect infestation of cut timber and forest products will be abandoned. Plans to enlarge the work relating to chemical treatment for the prevention of white ants can not be carried out. Generally speaking, the reduction will cripple the work of forest-insect control throughout the United States. This project has been carried on for a number of years without any increase in appropriation, although there has been a steady increase in the demand for assistance from the Forest Service, the National Park Service, and private owners of woodlands.

A cut of $21,760 has been made in the appropriation for truck crop and stored product insect investigations, and Congress has directed that $10,000 of the funds remaining be used for a new line of work. The project for the control of sweet potato weevil, the most serious menace to a southern food crop that was worth last year $138,000,000, will have to be considerably curtailed. The six States in which the weevil is known to exist are Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, which produce more than 50 per cent of the crop. Means for the eradication of the pest have been devised and are being satisfactorily carried out in three States. In a fourth, Alabama, the weevil has been practically eradicated, only one locality reporting an infestation during the last harvest. This work, so well begun, must now be greatly reduced. The let-up in the active campaign will result not only in heavy monetary losses to the South but lack of inspection and control operations may be followed by general reinfestation of the areas freed from the pest.

TWO INSECT-CONTROL STATIONS ABANDONED.

Aside from the sweet-potato weevil work, other serious curtailments must be made. We shall have to abandon the station at Greeley, Colo., which is investigating sugar beet and potato insects, and also the station at Chadbourne, N. C., which is studying berry and cabbage insects. Discontinuance of the work at Greeley is particularly unfortunate because of the threatened serious outbreak of the sugar-beet webworm this season. Without control, it may cause losses running into millions.

The fund for miscellaneous insect investigations has been reduced by $10,000. About three-fourths of this reduction must be borne by the project for the investigation of insects affecting the health of man, such as mosquitoes, the house fly, etc., and insects affecting domestic animals. Some of the work will have to be abandoned and the remainder curtailed. The rest of the cut will fall on what we call the systematic staff—a corps of experts of world-wide reputation brought together by reason of their intimate knowledge of the different groups of insects. An insect must be identified before the means of controlling it can be found. That is what these men do, not only for the Department of Agriculture but for the various State agricultural colleges and experiment stations.

GYPSY MOTH CONTROL WORK CURTAILED.

The fund for control of the gypsy moth and the brown-tail moth has been reduced by $52,650. This work was begun in 1906, when these two pests were threatening to destroy all kinds of trees in New England and the Northeast. Several million dollars of Federal money has been expended on it, and a still larger amount has been spent by the States concerned. The pests are under control, but disastrous spread has been prevented only with the greatest difficulty under the present appropriation. The Federal activities have been concentrated largely along the border lines, in order to protect the rest of the country, while work in the interior of the infested areas has been left largely to the States. Now work along the border line must be greatly curtailed and, if conditions are favorable for the spread of the pests, the year may see a great deal of new territory infested. Sporadic outbreaks have occurred from time to time in Ohio, New York, and New Jersey, but we have always succeeded in exterminating the moths in these areas. If such outbreaks occur now, there will not be sufficient money to handle them properly.

A reduction of $2,000 has been made in the appropriation for investigation of tropical and subtropical plant insects. That is a comparatively small sum of money, but it seriously affects six or seven projects, involving important fruit industries in California and Florida and the other Gulf States.

OTHER ACTIVITIES AFFECTED.

It is impossible in this statement to indicate in detail all the lines of work that will be affected by the reductions made in the department's appropriations for next year, and of course it does not take into account the projects which the department feels, as indicated in the estimates submitted to Congress, should be inaugurated or expanded in order to deal more effectively with important problems in the field of agriculture. Many important activities in addition to those mentioned will necessarily have to be curtailed, including investigations in the culture and improvement of forage crops, studies of live-stock production in sugar-cane and cotton districts, work in the control of the potato-wart disease, field experiments in the various methods of road construction and maintenance and investigations concerning road materials, farm-irrigation investigations, and farm-drainage investigations. A reduction of $50,000 in the fund heretofore available for the essential improvement work on the national forests will also make necessary the postponement of much-needed work in connection with the construction and maintenance of roads and trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, fences, and other improvements necessary for the proper and economical administration, protection, and development of the national forests.

All these reductions are much more serious than appears from a mere dollars and cents statement. A dollar, as we all know, buys much less of everything than it formerly bought and also does considerably less work. Even if all the appropriations had been retained at the old figures, therefore, the department would have been seriously handicapped in carrying on its work effectively.

Notwithstanding the recommendation of the department that it be eliminated, the item of $239,000 for congressional seed distribution has been included in the bill. A special letter was sent on February 26, 1920, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry strongly urging that the appropriation for the free seed distribution, which has been carried in the bill for many years, be discontinued and that the funds thus saved be used for the prosecution of urgently important investigational work on problems of crop production. The Senate committee adopted the department's recommendation and its action was confirmed by the Senate. The conferees, at first, were unable to reach an agreement on the matter, and so reported to both Houses of Congress. It was then considered by the House, and the House conferees were instructed to insist on the retention of the item in the bill. The question was reconsidered by the conferees, but they were unable to agree, and again reported a disagreement. The House again insisted on the inclusion of the appropriation in the bill. At this stage the Senate suggested, as a compromise, the following:

"For the purchase, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, $75,000. Said seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall be sent only to such persons as shall make request therefor: Provided, That all such requests made of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, if transmitted to the Department of Agriculture, shall be complied with by said department."

The House, however, refused to accept the proposal, and the Senate finally receded from its amendment striking the item from the bill. The congressional seed distribution, therefore, carrying an appropriation of $239,000, will be continued during the next fiscal year.

Better Salaries for Teachers and a New Conscience on Education.

Let Congress do its full duty to the teachers in the Nation's Capital, and it will have an electrical effect in raising the salaries of teachers all over America.

OF

HON. WILLIAM D. UPSHAW,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, March 26, 1920.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the graphic picture of American valor which our eloquent colleague from Washington [Mr. MILLER] has just painted for us—yes, and the victory and glory with which that valor was crowned—brought all of us to our feet with a pæan of thanksgiving in our hearts that the civilization for which these brave Americans fought was not lost. But the shocking revelation concerning our poorly paid teachers made in the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is himself a distinguished educator, brings us face to face with the fact that we are blind enough to suffer a process of neglect that threatens to submarine the very foundations of that civilization for which our brave boys fought and fell.

It was my good fortune—almost a melancholy pleasure—to see during the past two weeks a painful illustration of this fact. By invitation of that splendid head of the schools of the District of Columbia, Prof. Thurston, and the principals of different schools here, it has been my privilege during my short stay in Congress to speak to many thousands of the boys and girls in the Washington schools. Incidentally, may I say, I slip out between times and address boys and girls, as I have been doing for 25 years over the country, in order to keep young by bathing myself in a sea of youth. [Applause.] In speaking to 3,000 students in three different schools in the past two weeks, I saw the great educational tragedy of those 3,000 boys and girls, packed, standing in the aisles, and around the walls of each building, in auditoriums that were capable of seating comfortably only about half of that number.

At the Eastern High I found it that way; no room in which to take care of the boys and girls that are there in their general daily educational duties, to say nothing of occasional assemblies so necessary to the larger life of every school. At the McKinley High, the great technological school, I spoke to over a thousand bright young Americans, packed into an auditorium that would seat comfortably only 500. They were standing three or four deep, and I found that in this great school, bearing the honored name of the martyred Christian President, loved North and South and East and West, there is not even a gymnasium; and the neglect and congestion there is only illustrative of most of the other schools in this city. Only this week, by invitation of the principal, I spoke to the Business High here in Washington, about 1,100 students lining the walls and standing in the aisles in an auditorium seating barely 600.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who was a college president before coming to Congress, can bear testimony to the value of the assembly period in schools, its pyschic unity, and the school spirit that it produces; and yet I bring the startling declaration to you that, outside of the Central High School, there is not an adequate assembly room in any school of the Nation's Capital; and only three or four of these schools have any assembly room at all.

I want to emphasize, gentlemen, that if this Congress, which has to sit as a city council, a board of education, and the general educational guardian of the boys and girls of the National Capital, all in one, were charged with the proper rearing of pigs and calves and colts, if you please, we would see to it by proper legislation that they had plenty of room to gather and properly disport themselves for the fullest physical development. It seems that we are forgetting here, at the fountain head of our governmental life and our boasted and beloved civilization, the actual meaning of that civilization.

THE MEANING OF CIVILIZATION.

We are forgetting to teach by our appropriations that spell our investment in education and civilization; we are forgetting to teach, by our example to the rest of the country, that civilization does not exist and government is not maintained in order that men may clip their coupons and count their cash; that civilization does not exist and governments are not maintained in order that railroads may belt the continent like nerves of steel; that civilization does not exist and governments are not maintained in order that factories may turn their wheels to the music and march of progress; for all the factories and all the farms and all the industries of the District and the Nation, if sold here on the Capitol steps to-morrow at high noon, would not bring a single dollar if it were not for the boys and girls that give them their only value. These material concrete things that we are accustomed to call wealth have no intrinsic value in themselves; theirs is only a related value—a value that comes wholly from their relation to humanity—and I declare to you that it is the duty of this Congress to never again be scant and "little" toward the "crown jewels" of the Nation's Capital and the teacher-builders of our civilization.

It is bad enough for the men in the Army and the Navy, the officers on whose education this Government has spent literal millions, to have to leave the service and jeopardize the efficiency of our defenses as they are now forced to do for lack of a living compensation; but it is an infinitely worse tragedy that these teachers, who are the unsung, the uncrowned, the heroic, the unselfish sentinels along the outposts of our advancing civilization, should be living now, or trying to live, on salaries that force them to skimp and save and suffer—practically the same salary that they received many years ago, when the cost of living was less than half of what it is now—and some of these teachers tell me almost with tears in their eyes, and with a passion of patriotism that is positively as pathetic as it is heroic: "We are holding on to our work because we love it; we do not want to quit the schoolroom, but it is so hard to make buckle and tongue meet." Gentlemen of the House, such a situation in our educational life is nothing less than a tragedy. How can the teacher do his best or her best in developing childhood and building civilization when daily confronted with the pains of pinching poverty, when the sun of every day's terrific struggle goes down behind a cloud of uncertainty and anxiety? Teachers and preachers deal with the supremest questions that touch humanity, the principles that give humanity its supremest value, the things, let me urge, through which humanity gives value to everything else in the world, and so, gentlemen, let me put into italics the great need of our Washington schools. Indeed, I make an earnest plea for greater liberality toward our schools and teachers everywhere. Just about everybody's salary has been raised except teachers and preachers, and they are the real redeemers of our civilization.

A NEW EDUCATIONAL CONSCIENCE.

The truth is, my colleagues, the Nation needs a new conscience on the place of education in our national life. Great and overtowering as we know education to be from an economic standpoint, yet every community has missed its highest unit of computation and the Nation its loftiest incentive if schoolhouses are builded, colleges endowed, and teachers paid from a commercial point of value. While that community is blind and that nation asleep that does not recognize the economic value of education to every atom of property in reach of its influence, still we must lift education in the realm of our thinking and our building into the purer, sweeter atmosphere of ethical valuation. The president of Wellesley said one morning at the opening of the college term:

Girls, we don't promise you that the education we give you here will help you to get more bread, but we do promise you that it will make every morsel you eat taste sweeter.

And it is because education, the right kind of education, expands the individual, liberates the individual, broadens the horizon, and sweetens everything that it touches in individual, community, and national life that we, as a Nation, need a new educational conscience.

I believe the department of education should be lifted to the dignity and power of a Cabinet position, perhaps incorporating with it the department of health. If we have a Cabinet place for the handling of money; if we have Cabinet places for ships and men and guns and men; if Cabinet wisdom is invoked and Cabinet energy dedicated to the cultivation of our lands, the direction of our labor, and the development of our commerce, then, in the name of the God who made body, mind, and soul greater than all these tangible and perishing things, why should we not have Cabinet wisdom and Cabinet energy dedicated wholly to the guardianship and development of the crowning handiwork of God? For in vain do men coin money, till the soil, build up great properties, seek the solution of great problems, and fight and die for all of these unless they have minds to think, hearts to feel, and character to appreciate the blessings of liberty and the sacredness of home!

And because of these great fundamental considerations I believe that this Government, in its dealings with the District of Columbia—the only opportunity that Congress has to deal directly with the teachers, builders of our civilization—ought to seize upon this opportunity to lift the teachers' salaries in keeping with their needs and the dignity of their position; and such an act on the part of Congress in the Nation's Capital would have an electrical effect in raising the salaries of teachers all over America.

AGAINST COMPULSORY MILITARY TRAINING.

And while discussing these fundamentals in education I count it a good opportunity to register my protest against the proposed bill for compulsory military training. I believe in military training as a part of our educational system, but I do not believe in doing violence to the genius and spirit of free America by making the military feature compulsory in time of peace. Proper military training in school develops "young America" in physical prowess, obedience to law, and the general processes of discipline, and I believe the Government, from the standpoint of education as well as providing for the national defense, should offer every possible attraction to young men to take this course, giving encouragement without stint also to the fitting schools all over the land which have provided military training for their students. This is educational; this is patriotic. But let not the Government lay its hand on the treasured son of any home in time of peace and say, "You shall take military training." That is too much like Germany. That leads to the spirit of Prussian autocracy, which America and the Allies fought side by side to overthrow.

But before I sit down let me urge again a general policy of increased liberality toward our teachers and toward every facility for education, so that those who fashion the stature of our future citizenship may build in comfort and from every angle of wholesome inspiration.

Say not that the clay in their hands is "only a child." Only a child? Only a plastic mind, only a bundle of potential dynamics, only an "angel of light" or a demon of darkness, only a formative energy that shall poison the sweet waters of our Christian civilization or go forward to rule the world in righteousness "like ascending constellations in God's horoscope of time," only a spark from Divinity's throne, only an immortal spirit that, under proper tuition, shall "outlive the stars and outshine the sun."

Gentlemen, if we are to vote appropriations for anything during this session of Congress, let us vote for a substantial increase of salary for the teachers, and for an enlargement and improvement in the buildings for these splendidly conducted schools.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKEOWN. When we increase the salary, which is probably very much needed in the District of Columbia as well as needed throughout the Nation for the teachers, it seems to me there should be some care taken as to whether the teacher is sound on views of government. I understand that we are having some trouble with teachers who are hostile to our form of government.

Mr. UPSHAW. I have found no such teachers in our Washington schools. But even as there is "no place beneath the American flag for the heart that does not love it nor the arm that will not defend it," there is certainly no place in our school system for any teacher who is not true to that flag, and thus true to the boys and girls who, as Jacob Riis says, are "the to-morrow of the Republic."

More and more our schools must be made the trysting places of that loyalty and that God-fearing patriotism in whose responsive soil the noxious weeds of skepticism and anarchy can not grow; but rather a youthful enthusiasm for unselfish citizenship and that "righteousness that exalteth a nation." [Applause.]

The Merchant Marine Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is entitled—

An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

It is the so-called Greene bill passed by this House in the early part of December last together with several other bills which have been either passed by the House since that time or reported favorably to the House by the Merchant Marine Committee. These bills have all been included in one measure by this conference report upon which the House is now to take final action. Altogether the bill as it now stands constitutes, in my judgment, one of the most far-reaching constructive measures ever enacted by this or any other Congress.

The bill accomplishes the following very definite objects:

(1) It declares what is to be henceforward the policy of the United States with reference to its merchant marine. That policy is "to do whatever may be necessary" to develop and encourage the maintenance of a merchant marine under the American flag, to carry the greater portion of its commerce, and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, and ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States.

(2) It creates a Shipping Board to be composed of seven commissioners to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, specifying their terms of service, powers, duties, qualifications, and sections of the country from which they are to be appointed, viz, two from States touching the Pacific Ocean, two from States touching the Atlantic Ocean, one from States touching the Gulf of Mexico, one from States touching the Great Lakes, and one from the interior. Not more than four of these commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

(3) Repeals subject to certain specified limitations, five emergency acts and parts of acts placing extraordinary powers in the hands of the President during the war emergency, and transfers to said board all vessels and other property or interests of whatsoever kind acquired by the President pursuant to the authority conferred upon him by the acts and parts of acts repealed.

(4) Authorizes and directs the board to sell, as soon as practicable consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale, after appraisement and due advertisement, the vessels constituting our present Government-owned fleet. It specifies certain considerations that shall be taken into account by the board in fixing the price at which these ships may be sold and also limits such sale, except in the case of American vessels not deemed necessary to the "promotion and maintenance of an efficient American merchant marine," to persons who are citizens of the United States.

(5) It authorizes and directs the board to investigate and determine as promptly as possible after the act becomes effective, and from time to time thereafter, "what steamship lines should be established and put in operation from ports in the United States to such other domestic and world markets as in the judgment of the board are desirable for the promotion, development, expansion, and maintenance of the foreign and coastwise trade of the United States," and so forth. The board is also authorized in cooperation with the Secretary of War to investigate ports and the territorial regions and zones tributary thereto; the causes of the congestion of commerce at ports and the remedies applicable thereto; water terminals, including necessary docks, warehouses, and appliances, with a view to devise and suggest types most appropriate for different locations and for the most expeditious and economic transfer or interchange of passengers and property between carriers by water and carriers by rail; and if after such investigation the board is of opinion that rates, charges, rules, or regulations of common carriers by rail subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission are detrimental to the promotion, encouragement, and development of ports and transportation facilities, the board may submit its findings to the Interstate Commerce Commission for such action as such commission may consider proper under existing laws.

(6) Provides for a so-called "construction loan fund," consisting of a sum not exceeding $25,000,000, to be annually set aside by the board out of revenues from sales and operations to be used in securing the construction by persons, citizens of the United States, in private shipyards in the United States, of vessels of the best and most efficient type deemed by the board to be necessary and desirable in establishing steamship lines capable of meeting competition in the ocean carrying trade.

(7) Forbids, under penalty of fine of $5,000, or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, the sale, transfer, mortgage, except under regulations prescribed by the board, the charter of any vessel purchased from the board or documented under the laws of the United States, to any person not a citizen of the United States or the registry of any such vessel under a foreign flag without first obtaining the board's approval.

(8) Authorizes the board to make all necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of the act and particularly to make rules and regulations affecting shipping in the foreign trade not in conflict with law, in order to meet general or special conditions in the foreign trade which are believed to be unfavorable to our shipping and which conditions arise out of or result from foreign laws, rules, or regulations, or foreign competitive methods or practices employed by owners, operators, agents, or masters of vessels of a foreign country. No such rules or regulations, however, shall be established by the board to give any vessel owned by the United States any preference or favor over vessels owned by persons who are citizens of the United States and which vessels are documented under our laws. Forbids, under penalty of fine of not more than $25,000 for each offense, any payment or allowance or agreement or understanding, expressed or implied, to pay or allow deferred rebates to shippers or the making of any unfair or unjustly discriminatory contract with any shipper based on volume of freight offered or that excludes from admission upon equal terms with all other parties thereto a common carrier by water which is a citizen of the United States and which has applied for such admission.

(9) Extends the coastwise laws of the United States from and after February 1, 1922, to the island possessions of the United States not now covered thereby. In the meantime the board is directed to have established adequate steamship service at reasonable rates to accommodate the commerce and passenger travel of said islands and to maintain and operate such service until it can be taken over and operated and maintained upon satisfactory terms by private capital and enterprise.

(10) Repeals the act giving the Shipping Board power to permit vessels of foreign registry and foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry under the act of August 18, 1914, to engage in the coastwise trade during the present war and for a period of 120 days thereafter, except coastwise trade with Alaska. This is subject to the provision that foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry owned by citizens of the United States on February 1, 1920, and foreign-built vessels owned by the United States at the time this act becomes effective when sold and owned by persons who are citizens of the United States may engage in the coastwise trade so long as they continue in such ownership, subject to the rules and regulations of such trade. Provision is also made that until February 1, 1922, the board may issue permits for carrying passengers in foreign ships if such permission is deemed to be necessary between the Territory of Hawaii and the Pacific coast.

(11) Allows the owner of a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and operated in foreign trade for each of the 10 taxable years while so operated, beginning with the first taxable year ending after the act becomes effective, a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining his net income, subject to war-profits and excess-profits taxes, of an amount equal to the net earnings of such vessel during such taxable year, to be determined in accordance with rules and regulations made by the board, and provided that such owner shall not be entitled to such deduction unless during such taxable year he invests, in the building in shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, an amount equivalent to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would have been payable by such owner but for such allowance. Provision is also made that any citizen of the United States who during the next 10 years may sell a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and built prior to January 1, 1914, shall be exempt from income taxes payable upon the proceeds of such sale, provided the entire proceeds thereof shall be invested in the building of new ships in American shipyards to be documented under the laws of the United States and to be of a type approved by the board.

(12) Provides for the recognition by the Government and all departments, boards, bureaus, and commissions thereof of the American Bureau of Shipping as their agency for the classification of vessels owned by the United States, this to continue as long as such board continues to be maintained as an organization having no capital stock and paying no dividends.

(13) Debars all merchandise from transportation by water, or by land and water, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, between points in the United States and its possesions embraced within the coastwise laws, in any other vessel than a vessel built and documented under the laws of the United States and owned by persons who are citizens of the United States, or vessels to which the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade is extended by section 18 or 22 of the act. This section, however, is not to apply to merchandise transported between points within the continental United States over through routes recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission for which routes rate tariffs have been or shall hereafter be filed with said commission, when such routes are in part over Canadian rail lines and connecting water facilities.

(14) Makes provision for so-called "export and import rates" whereby vessels documented under the laws of the United States may charge, collect, or receive for transportation, under any joint rate or under any export, import, or other proportional rate which is based in whole or in part on the fact that the persons or property affected thereby are to be transported to, or have been transported from, any port in a possession or dependency of the United States or in a foreign country by a carrier by water in foreign commerce, a lower rate, fare, or charge than that which is charged by it for the transportation of persons or a like kind of property for the same distance in the same direction and over the same route in connection with commerce wholly within the United States. The giving of such preferential rates to vessels documented under their own laws is now a common practice among nearly all of the great maritime nations of the world. It is believed that a like permission given to our own vessels will, to some extent, aid in overcoming the handicap under which American shipowners must continue to operate their ships, at least so long as they are, as now, overloaded with construction costs, maintenance costs, labor, and other operating costs, and a none too high general efficiency. If we do not in some way lighten that dead-weight load in accordance with the principles and practices of other countries whose shipping is successful we shall have small hope of success in this highly competitive business.

(15) Provides for associations to take care of the marine insurance and reinsurance business in the United States instead of allowing this business, as heretofore, to be done almost entirely through foreign agencies.

(16) Makes provision under which the ship mortgage may be given a legally preferred status instead of, as now, being subject to so many liens, a fact which militates very strongly against it as a high-class security. This to my mind is one of the most important features of the bill. It should aid materially in interesting capital throughout the country to go into the shipping business. I believe it will be a great help to the operator with a small or moderate amount of capital in obtaining the necessary credit for the purchase of one or more of these ships.

There is reason to believe that America to-day has the opportunity to enter upon another period of supremacy upon the sea. For upwards of a half century natural as well as economic conditions have operated in such a way as practically to eliminate this country from the ocean carrying trade. Without attempting to go into the details of the various causes which brought about this condition, it may suffice to state that so long as Great Britain was able to build ships at least 40 per cent cheaper than we were able to build them, and so long as wages and other operating costs on American ships were substantially higher than on British ships, and so long as antiquated navigation laws still further hampered and embarrassed American ship owners and operators, it was well-nigh impossible to interest capital in American shipping. Especially has that been true during the last 50 or 60 years, when the great industrial development of the interior States has held out to the enterprising capitalist and investor far greater inducements than he could possibly see in the merchant marine.

There was a time, however, when America was supreme in navigation. Indeed, at least twice in our maritime history has American genius and enterprise been sufficient to give us a commanding position on the sea. The first period was between 1800 and about 1820, when approximately 90 per cent of all our foreign trade was being carried by our own ships. The second period was between 1840 and 1860. This was the period when the famous "clipper ships" developed, in which American navigators made records which have never to this day been equaled by "wind and wood."

It was in this period that radical changes in the design of the hull, which skeptics said would surely result in the sinking of the ships, were inaugurated by American builders, and the first sailing ship of radical design, which crowds gathered in New York to see sink on its launching, went to Hongkong and back in record time. It was during this same period that shippers all over the world paid bonuses up to $10 a ton for American ships, whose time was uniform and much less on long voyages than that of British ships.

From these high spots in our maritime history we had, through the operation of many causes, some of which I have alluded to, come to the position at the outbreak of the late European war when, instead of carrying 90 per cent or thereabouts of our foreign trade in our own ships, we were carrying less than 10 per cent of it. Our total average yearly production of ships of over 3,000 tons in the United States previous to the war was only about 250,000 dead-weight tons.

But the Great War has seemingly brought us the opportunity to reclaim our lost prestige upon the sea. When the deadly submarine was destroying merchant shipping at a frightful rate, the world looked to America for ships to meet the staggering losses. At that time we had not only few ships suitable for ocean transportation, but we had comparatively few shipyards in which to build such ships. In order to get the ships to construct the needed "bridge to France" we had first to construct the yards. Moreover, at the outbreak of the war we did not have in all the country probably over 50,000 men who understood the art of building ships. As a practical proposition, except for the coastwise trade, the shipping industry in America had gone out of existence and shipbuilding had become a lost art.

It will stand forever to the credit of the American name that in this great emergency American courage and enterprise were equal to the situation. In place of a bare 50,000 shipbuilders in 1914, we had at the time of the armistice close to 350,000. In place of a total of 65 shipyards in America in April, 1917, containing 102 shipways for the building of steel and wooden ships of over 3,000 tons, we have to-day a total of 223 yards, containing 1,099 shipways. These men and these yards have built and delivered to the Government since we entered the war a total of 2,001 ships, having a dead-weight tonnage of 11,179,343 tons.

There are also at the present time in process of construction 285 more ships of 2,100,000 dead-weight tonnage capacity, making a total of 2,286 ships completed or in process of completion and having a capacity of 13,343,761 tons. In the last eight months there has been delivered and put in operation an average of more than 600,000 dead-weight tons of shipping each month. This is more than twice as much tonnage per month as we built on an average in a year in prewar times. I have said, and I repeat it, it furnishes a record of which Americans may well be proud—a record, too, that is without parallel in the shipping history of the world. When we consider the manifold difficulties and embarrassments under which this work of such tremendous magnitude has been done, too much can not be said in commendation of all those who have been in any way responsible for its accomplishment.

The important question to-day with reference to these ships—the question in which we are all interested—is this: What are we going to do with them? They were built to meet an emergency. We had to have that "bridge to France" in order to get our Army and its supplies to the firing line. The cry was for ships and more ships, anything that could sail the sea and get the much-needed men and food supplies to Europe. Of course the cost has been enormous—many times what it would have been if the same ships had been constructed in prewar days. These 2,286 ships will have cost the taxpayers of this country approximately $3,000,000,000. But the fact that we were able to build them in this record-breaking time was a factor, and I believe a most important factor, in bringing Germany to see the futility of her scheme of world empire and forcing a conclusion of hostilities a year ago. Even if the ships never did another thing or earned another dollar they would, in my view of it, be well worth to America and to the world the full amount they have cost.

Now that the emergency is over, however, the American people expect to see these ships, at least those that are useful, retained under the American flag and used to reestablish a great and prosperous merchant marine. They want to see this done for two reasons: First, because they have a justifiable national pride in seeing the produce of our fields and factories and mines going, not in foreign ships under foreign flags but in our own ships and under the American flag, into all the ports and harbors of the world; and, second, because they wish never again to be placed in the humiliating position, in the event of war, of being called upon to defend themselves without any auxiliary naval fleet. Both as a commercial proposition and from the standpoint of national defense, therefore, we must, if possible, retain this fleet, or at least all of it that is permanently useful, and use it to build up and establish an American carrying trade upon the sea.

But it takes something more than ships of any type to make a merchant marine. These 2,286 ships are built of steel and wood and composite and concrete. None of them have a speed equal to 10 knots an hour. Very many of them are comparatively small boats; that is, under 6,000 dead-weight tons. A good many of them are of less than 4,000 dead-weight tons, and these small boats are all of deep draft, anywhere from 24 to 30 feet, making them wholly unfit for use in many of the shallow water harbors on the Central and South American coasts. Approximately 600 of these ships are built of wood and are believed to be wholly unfit for permanent and efficient service in the ocean carrying trade. They were built purely to meet emergency needs and apparently have little or no value when we come to consider the needs of an American merchant marine. Of the whole 2,286 ships there are practically no passenger steamers. The great majority of them are cargo carriers, tankers, and barges. Many of the larger boats, on account of their relatively slow speed and on account of their equipment with various kinds and makes of boilers requiring heavy renewal expenses in the near future, are probably unsuitable for the stiff competition which is bound to come when the present high freight rates go down and the world once more gets onto something like a normal peace basis. Mr. J. H. Rosseter, until recently director of operations of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, and himself one of the best-informed and most competent ship operators in America, in testifying recently before the Merchant Marine Committee of the House of Representatives, used the following language:

> We built a lot of ships in a great hurry for war purposes. There was abroad in the country the impression that those ships should be serviceable for our overseas commerce when the war was over. That was a very nebulous idea. It was entirely erroneous, for the ships which we built were in no way at that time suited for the establishment of an American overseas service. We have at this moment to rely on the ex-Germans we seized on the declaration of hostilities and the 26 ships we have built of a high class. Beyond that we have nothing but a motley array of ships best described as tramps, a class of ships which can not survive in the international competition. Thus we have not the nucleus, either for ourselves or for private enterprise, to do the things the country believes and expects you are going to do.

I asked Mr. Rosseter if it was not the purpose of the Shipping Board in the construction of this fleet to have something when the war was over which would be of use to us. This was his answer:

> They all thought that, but there was no shipping men on that board, and when they started in to build a ship they took the Robert Dollar type of tramp ship. I know the Robert Dollar type of ship very well. She was contracted in 1911, and at the very same time I contracted, in an exchange of confidence with Mr. Dollar, for a ship to be erected at the immediately adjoining yard. The Robert Dollar cost $240,000, and our ship, somewhat smaller, built in Great Britain in the adjoining yard, cost $450,000, almost double and not quite so large. Now, I was not throwing that $200,000 away. I was looking and thinking in the same terms I am thinking now, that it is not the tramp that I wanted. I wanted the ship that was the hard-time ship, the ship that would survive under competitive conditions and would establish a regular service.
> Now, when we built we did not build the improved type I had been building; we went to work and copied the Robert Dollar type that will average 9 knots and do well at that, a ship that will come into a port and handle ten or twelve hundred tons of cargo a day, whereas my ship will handle 6,000 tons of cargo a day with her own gear. We never thought of that when designing our fleet at all. We had in the back of our minds the fact that these ships would be serviceable for our trade, but we did not have the knowledge and experience to distinguish between what we needed and what was not needed. What we were principally thinking of was to construct that bridge of ships to France and the thing we could build quickest.

I quote this testimony of Mr. Rosseter's not to disparage or discredit the ships we have. There are undoubtedly very many good ships among them. Most of them, I understand, have been rated A1 by Lloyd's Register of Shipping. That means that they meet the test of the British standard ships, and, of course, as we all know, the British standard has heretofore been regarded as the world's standard in this regard.

But I cite these words of Mr. Rosseter's to illustrate a point which I think we are likely not to have in mind, and which, as I view it, is a most important consideration of this problem of the merchant marine. What I mean is this: Ships are good ships or bad ships, efficient or inefficient, according as they meet or fail to meet the requirements of the particular trade routes in which they are to be used. If we are to make effective our efforts for the reestablishment of the merchant marine it is a prime necessity that we should establish regular lines. Indeed, everything fails if we fail or neglect to get our ships into regular lines or trade routes. By "regular lines" I mean lines sailing under a fixed schedule at definite dates, making certain ports of call outward and certain ports of call homeward and returning to the port of origin. I do not wish to underestimate the importance of the so-called "tramp" steamer. No doubt the major part of the tonnage of the world prior to the war was of this class and their operations had a very appreciable effect in regulating ocean freight rates. The fact, however, still remains that the regular lines to Central and South America, to the Continent of Europe, to the Baltic, and to the Mediterranean ports and to the Far East must constitute the backbone of a permanent and prosperous American merchant marine.

Now, a ship may be serviceable and reasonably efficient in one of these trade routes and wholly inefficient and unable to meet competitive conditions in another of these routes. For instance, in the Central and South American trade no doubt the smaller type of steamer can be used to advantage. I refer to ships of 3,000 or 4,000 tons. But such ships, as I understand it, must have a much lighter draft than the ships of this size that we now have. This is on account of the shallow-water ports in these regions. None of them ought to have a maximum draft of over 18 feet, whereas the ships of this class that we have draw, as I say, from 24 to 30 feet of water. On the other hand, these small ships are wholly unfit to compete successfully in the regular trade routes to Europe and the Orient. This is due to their slowness of speed and to their relatively high cost of operation. For such trade routes we need the ten, twelve, and fifteen thousand ton ships. Instead of 9 knots an hour they ought to have a speed of from 12 to 15 knots an hour.

In other words, the point I am trying to make is that in order to be serviceable and efficient and reasonably meet competitive conditions, the ship must be adapted in size and draft and speed to the conditions that obtain in the particular trade route in which it is to be used. No doubt a good many of the ships we have can be used economically in these trade routes already established, or new ones that we may establish, into different parts of the world. But it is the opinion of men who have had large experience in operating ships that a considerable proportion of these 2,286 ships we now have are not of such type and design as will be able to meet competitive conditions in the regular lines of overseas trade when the world once more gets onto a normal basis of trade. It is my opinion, and the bill so provides, that such ships should be sold. In that class I would put all the wooden ships, all the composite and concrete ships, probably quite a percentage of the steel ships under 6,000 tons, and some, although a much smaller percentage, of the steel ships above 6,000 tons. These ships should be sold at as early a date as it can be done consistent with good business judgment. American citizens should be given the first chance to buy them, but in any event they should be sold, because they are not, and can not be made to be, useful and efficient in a permanent, prosperous merchant marine. I would put in charge of the sale of these ships the best trader I could find—some "David Harum"—who would try to get out of them for the Treasury of the United States as nearly as possible their original cost of construction, but who, in any event, would find somebody who could use them in some part of world commerce, and would be glad to get them at a reasonable price. Any loss to the Government sustained from such a transaction I would charge off on the books and forget it.

This would probably leave us ten or twelve hundred ships of fair size, some of them less than 6,000 tons, but most of them more than 6,000 tons, and with a total tonnage of perhaps 9,000,000 tons. We ought, in my judgment, to dispose of them in such a way as will bring them as far as possible into regular lines in our overseas trade. These steel ships of the larger and better types I would sell only to American citizens. We must keep these ships under the American flag. But they should ultimately be sold, because I am confident it is not in the interest of an efficient and prosperous merchant marine that the Government should own and operate the fleet.

The best opinion in America to-day is clearly and unequivocally and strongly opposed to Government ownership and operation of ships as much as it is opposed to such ownership and operation of railroads, telegraph lines, or any of our other great essential industries. And there is good reason for this. Governmental action is notoriously slow and the machinery cumbersome. Its methods are wasteful and inefficient. Red tape ties the hands of bureau chiefs, who for 24 hours every day are smothered in the atmosphere of politics. Nowhere, to my knowledge, has Government operation of any kind of business ever been a success outside of Prussia under a militaristic régime.

But we can not dump this great mass of shipping on the market and expect to dispose of it overnight. We certainly should not sell these ships to anybody who is willing to take them and pay the price. Indeed our prime purpose in selling the ships ought not to be to get the high dollar for them. Our prime purpose, as the bill provides, should be to develop and encourage the maintenance of an American merchant marine. It is because, and only because, we believe private ownership and operation will best serve that great purpose that we provide for their disposition by the Government in such a manner as is best calculated to get them into the trade routes of the world, in the hands of American citizens who have the means, the experience, the ability, and the enterprise to operate them successfully.

Not for a moment should we forget it is not money we are after primarily in the sale of these ships, but rather the establishment of a great and prosperous American merchant marine.

I said a moment ago that we should not sell the ships to Tom, Dick, and Harry—anybody who will take them and pay the price—but we may as well face the fact that Tom, Dick, and Harry will be after them from the moment they go on sale. Why? Not at all for any constructive purpose, not at all to aid in building up a merchant marine. They will seek these ships because they see in the abnormal high freight rates now prevalent throughout the world an opportunity to make some money. They would not build up an organization necessary for a permanently successful service. They would use the ships as "tramps," skim off the cream while the high freight rates continue, and then go out of business as suddenly as they came into it, and send the ships to the junk pile. Such an event would be disastrous, and we must guard against the possibility of its occurrence. I believe the present bill does that.

How, then, shall the ships be sold? In my judgment the one thing necessary above all others is for the Government to take such action as shall aid prospective purchasers in getting the necessary credit. We want the ships as widely distributed as possible among responsible operators. As things stand now, the banking interests of the country do not look with favor upon a shipping enterprise. Why? Because the Government has not yet declared any policy either as to what its prime purpose is with reference to its ships, whether it will continue itself to operate ships in competition with those it may sell, or as to the prices at which it will dispose of this tonnage. Moreover, the ship mortgage, unlike most any other mortgage, is subject to many liens; and this fact militates against it as a high-class security. Add to this the fact that the Government allows the shipowner to charge off only 3 per cent for depreciation in determining the amount of excess-profits taxes, when the actual depreciation is probably at least four times that amount, and you can begin to get an idea why business and financial interests have not been overanxious to invest their money in the shipping business. All of these considerations have been taken into account in framing this bill.

We must not be deluded by those who tell us that the long-hoped-for American merchant marine has at last arrived. Many and great difficulties yet lie in the way of its arrival. Ships alone—and certainly such ships as we have—do not make a merchant marine. After 60 years of reliance upon foreign shipping in our ocean carrying trade we must develop again among our people the habit of thinking in terms of the sea. We must stop playing into the hands of our rivals by discriminating against our own ships through our false system of regulating details of ship management by act of Congress. We must define the legal status of the ship mortgage, making it, so far as possible, a first-class security. In order to overcome the handicap of the substantially greater cost of operating American ships we are doing well in following the example already set by some of our States in exempting from the payment of excess-profits taxes for a period of years American citizens, corporations, and firms who shall purchase and operate ships in the foreign trade, provided that the amount thus saved be invested in new American-built tonnage.

If we are willing to adopt a broad and comprehensive governmental policy along the lines indicated, and as provided in the pending bill, it is not unreasonable to believe that the ships can be disposed of at fair prices and placed in the hands of competent operators, men who have the necessary knowledge of conditions and the necessary energy, vision, and enterprise to create a sufficient organization, including the agents and facilities in foreign ports, necessary to establish from eight to ten million tons of American shipping in the trade routes of the world. If we can do that, we have good reason to expect to see in the not far distant future the American flag once more flying at the masthead in every port and harbor of the world, announcing the return to the sea of an American merchant marine capable of handling at least one-half, and probably considerably more than that, of our large and increasing foreign trade.

A Few Facts.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK CROWTHER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, during the first and second sessions of the present Congress we have reduced the Democratic demands for public expenditures by more than $2,000,000,000. We have pared down their Army bill so as to save another billion dollars annually. When the people shall give the Republican Party full charge of the executive as well as the legislative branch of the Government we will proceed immediately to recover at every possible point the tremendous waste of public funds during the period of the war amounting to billions of dollars. With courage and confidence we face the future and appeal to the citizenship of the country for adequate political power to accomplish this result.

TAXES V. TARIFF.

In the Treasury Department it was currently reported that the Underwood tariff was intended to cut $100,000,000 out of the tariff revenues. It accomplished that purpose without any serious difficulty. It was also indicated that the shortage was to be replaced by a like return from income tax. What does the record show? When the first returns came in and a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury cast his dragnet over the country to catch the millionaires and round them up with funds sufficient to supply the Treasury for evermore and thus prevent a deficit, what did he discover?

Under the income tax the returns were $67,000,000, but previous to this action we had been gathering in from the corporation tax enacted in 1909 the sum of $30,000,000 annually. Thus there was a net return from the Democratic income-tax law for the first year of only $37,000,000. Gloom, dark and heavy, o'ercast the countenances of Democratic chiefs in the Treasury at this time. They started out in a second effort to find some more millionaires and failed in the search, and Congress was called upon for more legislation and enacted more war taxes in time of peace. Still they were short about $30,000,000 of the $100,000,000 that had been cut out of tariff returns. A third effort was made, and still the $100,000,000 did not materialize.

The volume of imports up to the present time, if the Republican tariff that was on the books in 1913 had remained a law, would have given us about $1,200,000,000 more in customs revenues then we have received and without any increase in the cost of living. The Democratic policy of "as near free trade as we dare" has cost us a billion and a quarter dollars. But a small matter of a billion is mere piffle to the Democratic Party that has squandered the people's Liberty bond subscriptions like a drunken sailor.

Mr. McAdoo recently boasted of the fact that there were no panics while he was Secretary of the Treasury. Of course not; when a nation is raising money by every possible device and distributing it with lavish hand among cost-plus contractors and Government departments crowded to overflowing with useless help, there is no thought at such time of financial panic. The panicky days come when the time arrives to "pay up"—"the day of reckoning," so to speak. Long before that day arrived Mr. McAdoo bowed himself out very gracefully and allied himself with the moving-picture heroes and heroines as their legal adviser, having in the meantime also gracefully ducked the impending railroad strikes and general unsatisfactory rail conditions that developed during his incumbency as Director General.

THE WORLD WAR.

The war was won by American soldiers backed up by the American people, but all that we have heard in this session of Congress is that the Democrats and their party won the war. The records are filled with evidence of their wild extravagance and profligate waste; they are open for all who care to read them; and the only excuse the Democrats offer is that the extreme necessity demanded unusual haste and methods perhaps subject to criticism.

Two years of letter writing and watchful waiting and no heed taken of constant advice as to preparedness forces us to regretfully acknowledge that such wasteful procedure was in some instances necessary. And now we must pay the bill; not the Democrats, but every man, woman, and child, irrespective of political affiliation.

After all, the real sacrifice was made by the boys who gave their lives and the fathers and mothers and widows who must gaze at the "vacant chair" for long years to come. Those who came back to us wounded, and some even helpless, must be the subject of our heartfelt consideration, and this Congress will continue to provide legislation that will permit these boys to fit themselves as useful members of society. They come back to us filled with ambition in spite of their severe handicap, desiring to prove their worth in peace time as they did in war. We must open every gate leading to the garden of opportunity, thus fulfilling in some slight measure our obligation for the service they rendered.

THE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION ACT.

Under the agricultural extension act the wonderful fund of knowledge accumulated by the great Agricultural Department, during its entire existence, in agriculture, horticulture, animal industry, farm economics, raising, canning, and preserving foods, and many other useful investigations, is being placed at the service of the farmers in practically every agricultural county in the United States, under a cooperative plan, by trained men and women in the service of the Government. Under this cooperative system provided for in this law a method of itinerant agricultural teaching and demonstration of home economics and agriculture has been inaugurated, which has revolutionized, diversified, and increased production throughout our great country.

THE GOOD ROADS ACT.

Under the "good roads law" millions of dollars have been appropriated and are being expended by the Government in aiding the construction of good roads to the marvelous benefit of all the people. Nothing is more conducive to development and prosperity than the improvement of our roads and highways.

Good roads are essentially a necessary attribute to agricultural success. The difficult problem all over the country is for the farmer to get his produce to market. Good roads have simplified this difficulty, and together with the great advantage offered by the establishment of the public markets has made the way easier for our American farmers. It is remarkable that there should be manifested a spirit of antagonism against the farmers by those who represent the cities in this House and elsewhere. The prices of farm products which the consumers in the cities pay are at least twice what the farmer who produces such products receives. This more than 100 per cent increase between the farmer and the consumer represents the unconscionable profits which their own dealers receive and impose upon their fellow citizens. But instead of trying to limit the excessive profits of their own dealers to the detriment of the great body of their own consumers, these gentlemen blame all this high cost of living on the farmers, and when the farmers make any effort to reduce the immoderate profits of these middlemen, or desire by cooperation to increase production to the immediate benefit of the city consumer, the city representatives oppose their efforts.

It would be much wiser if those who represent city constituencies would realize that not only their prosperity but their lives are dependent on the products of the farm. Everything they eat and wear comes from the farm. Every comfort they enjoy comes from the farm. It will not be by opposition to the interests of the farmers that they can further their own interests. It will not be by discouragement, discredit, and abuse of the farmers that they will insure their own prosperity. It should be seen by all that our prosperity and the comfort and happiness of our people must depend upon the cooperation and friendly relationship of all, and that no class or portion of our citizenship can afford to build his own prosperity on the misfortune or discomfiture of others. "One country, one and indivisible," is not only a good political maxim, but it is a wise, economic, and business principle as well.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Democratic national chairman, Mr. Cummings, issued a dismal wail to the effect that the Senate "has broken faith with our allies." Is that so? Well, it has kept faith with America and has preserved the Constitution and the American liberty, and, after all, that is where the duty of the Senate lay. It is impossible to break faith with our allies in preserving our own honor and nationalism.

Perhaps both Woodrow Wilson and his ardent followers have forgotten the following pungent words uttered by the President in Washington, D. C., on May 6, 1914. To refresh their memories I quote as follows:

> America should lead her own life. * * * We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way. We need not, and we should not, form alliances with any nation in the world. Those who are right, those who hold their honor higher than their advantage, do not need alliances.

Thus is the league condemned out of the mouth of its most ardent supporter.

REPUBLICAN DOCTRINE.

When we consider the absolute lack of anything under Democratic rule that might by wide stretch of the imagination be described as a foreign policy, it will be inspiring and invigorating to read once more the words of President McKinley, delivered at his first inaugural:

> It has been the policy of the United States since the foundation of the Government to cultivate relations of peace and amity with all the nations of the world, and that accords with my conceptions now. We have cherished the policy of noninterference with the affairs of foreign Governments, wisely inaugurated by Washington, keeping ourselves free from entanglement, either as allies or foes, content to leave undisturbed with them the settlement of their own concerns. It will be our aim to pursue a firm, dignified foreign policy, which shall be just, impartial, ever watchful of our national honor, and always insisting upon the lawful rights of American citizens everywhere. Our diplomacy should seek nothing more and accept nothing less than is due us.

The plain, everyday folks that are the backbone of this country, those in industrial, professional, or agricultural pursuits, are all looking forward to a return to first principles. We gave our boys' precious lives to help kill autocracy, and we must banish its baneful influences that have so significantly manifested themselves during the past seven years of Democratic rule. Let the Constitution continue to be the basic foundation stone of these great United States, with equal rights and equal privileges for all, not forgetting that in return we owe unswerving devotion and loyalty to our country and its emblem of Stars and Stripes.

OF

HON. CLAUDE KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, April 9, 1920.

The House had under consideration joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I find myself in hearty agreement with the entire speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] who has just taken his seat, except as to his statement of facts and his conclusions. [Laughter.] I must also confess surprise that he should make a speech condemning the League of Nations and denouncing the President of the United States for his attitude toward the League of Nations. Why, my friends, I remember one of the best speeches I ever heard or read in favor of a League of Nations to enforce peace, in favor of the combined military and naval strength of the nations being summoned against an offending or attacking nation, was the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] on this floor on January 19, 1919. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In that speech he strongly favored and espoused the cause of a League of Nations whose fundamental principle was brute military and naval force in the protection of the political and territorial integrity of every nation that belonged to such a League of Nations, and my

Republican friends who applauded him to-day to the echo in his denunciation of the President and the League of Nations should turn after this vote to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 19, 1919, and read what he said then, and ask themselves what manner of man is this? [Laughter.] Not only was he in favor of a League of Nations far beyond that which the President has indorsed, but he ridiculed and criticized Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE and Senator KNOX, of Pennsylvania, for opposing a League of Nations to enforce peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He denounced to-day the President of the United States for keeping in force the war measures. The President does not, can not, keep any war measures in force. This Republican Congress keeps them in force. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has had the power any day since May 19, 1919, to repeal them, but has refused to repeal a single one. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Certainly the President was in favor of enforcing the law, the Lever Act, as long as a Republican Congress permitted it to remain on the statute books. He was sworn to enforce it, and under it the Attorney General issued injunctions against the strikers in the coal mines. If there was or is anything wrong, if there was or is anything unjust, in that Lever Act, in that war measure, under which the courts issued injunctions against labor leaders and striders in the coal strikes, why in the name of common sense and common justice has not some one Republican in this House since the 19th of May, 1919, up to this good hour, introduced a bill to repeal that act? [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the gentleman knows of outrages the President or the Attorney General committed in the coal strike, he knows and has known ever since this Republican Congress convened on May 19, 1919, that act was on the statute books, and I ask him why has he not or why has not some Republican introduced a bill to repeal that so-called outrageous war measure? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am a little surprised at his referring to this coal strike and condemning the administration's attitude in it in face of the fact that on October 31, 1919, every Republican in this House, as well as every other Member, voted for the resolution to give "constant, continuous, and unqualified support" to the President in the enforcement of the Lever Act in relation to the coal strike. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] had been present then, he would have voted for it, too. But he was not here. As I said, every Republican present and every Democrat present voted to indorse the President's position in enforcing the Lever Act against the coal strikers. In condemning the President my friend from Illinois condemns Mr. MONDELL, the majority leader; he condemns Mr. FESS, chairman of the Republican congressional committee; he condemns Dr. TEMPLE and Mr. Chairman PORTER; he condemns the Republicans of the committee that reported this resolution; he condemns the whole Republican Party in this House except himself, because he happened not to be here then. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I will not discuss the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of this resolution. But it was strikingly observable that the opponents of this bill yesterday and to-day did cite authority after authority, did cite the framers of the Constitution, men like Jay and Hamilton and Jefferson and Madison; they did cite all the law writers of this country on the Constitution; they did cite statesmen from the days the Government was founded until 1900, Republicans, Democrats, Federalists, and Whigs; they did cite resolutions of Congress after Congress from the formation of the Congress up to 1900, all declaring that a resolution like this was unconstitutional. And I listened to the speech of every gentleman who has advocated this resolution, and I have read the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and not one authority, from the framers of the Constitution, from the statesmanship of this country, the writers on the Constitution, or from the Congress, has been cited by a single one to sustain the constitutionality of this resolution.

What does this resolution do? They call it a peace resolution. They would have the people believe that the Republican Party is in favor of peace and ending the war, and that this resolution does this. Why, gentlemen, we have peace. The war has been ended. The passage of this resolution will not prevent a single German from shooting down an American boy in France, because the shooting and fighting were stopped 17 months ago. The passage of this resolution will not bring back to America a single soldier from France. He is already back, and he has been back for months. The passage of this resolution will not demobilize the Army, for it has been demobilized. The passage of this resolution will not send back to a mother or a father a single boy. He is already at home in their arms and has been there for months. The Democratic administration sent him there. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A technical, official ending of the war has not been made or declared. This resolution, although in my judgment unconstitutional, purports to put a technical and official end to the war between Germany and the United States. Gentlemen, I can not understand how any American patriot who knows the facts—I can not understand under the conditions how any red-blooded American, either born here or foreign born—can possibly justify his vote for this resolution in declaring the war technically at an end. Although physical war has stopped, it is absolutely necessary for technical, official war to continue. Why? If this resolution passes and should become a law—which it never can—then the technical, official ending of the war has been brought about. Why is it necessary for us to keep a technical, official state of war? In order to permit the United States, in making a treaty with Germany—and one must be made separately by the United States if we do not ratify the treaty of Versailles in one form or another—to treat her as a vanquished and defeated foe, with the United States, with our country, as the victor. If this war is declared to be technically at an end, then when America attempts to make a treaty with Germany, Germany and the United States must stand on equal terms—with both parties equal. Every other nation at war with Germany kept up the technical, official condition of war and never dared to end it technically until they had dictated, as conquerors, to Germany, the vanquished nation, the terms of the treaty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] These Republicans, if they are sincere in this, would have America placed at a disadvantage, would have America put in the position of treating with Germany on equal terms, not as a defeated foe but as her equal. Germany would have as much right then to demand and dictate terms as America would. We must continue this technical state of war in order that America may treat with Germany in a treaty of any kind just exactly like every other ally and every other country in the world treated her—as a defeated foe, as a vanquished nation, and they as victors.

If by this resolution we end this war technically, then if America in treating with Germany should want to have the advantage of her victory, if she wanted to stand in the position of a triumphant, victorious nation, which her immense sacrifices achieved, Congress would have to declare war over again, so that she could dictate the terms of the treaty of peace, which would start afresh an uproar throughout the world. A nation not technically at war with another can not dictate terms. Only the victor nation can dictate terms to the vanquished nation. Gentlemen, have you thought of the measureless sacrifices in lives and blood and treasure which our country has made, and are you now ready by this resolution to vote to forego the advantages which these sacrifices have given your country? Do you propose this resolution in the interest of Germany or in the interest of your own country? If you have any red American blood in you, you are bound to vote against this resolution and keep America in the position to treat with Germany as every other nation on earth at war with Germany has treated with her and dictate terms as a victorious, triumphant Nation to her as a vanquished, defeated nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

End this war technically by such a resolution, if you dare, and then Germany can demand such terms as she pleases equally with your own country, and the result of the negotiations might be that the demands and the terms of the treaty would conflict with the terms and demands of the treaty made by our allies with Germany and make America cross the obligations and terms of the treaty made with her allies, to the detriment of America and to the detriment of the Allies. It would not be treating the Allies, with whom we won this war, fairly and justly to permit Germany to treat with America on equal terms, because the treaty, if made, might conflict with the interests of our allies.

So that, gentlemen, it is absolutely necessary, from the real patriotic American standpoint, that the state of technical war should be continued. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said in his speech the other day, amid a round of applause, that there had not been an hour since October 15 when this country could not have ended the war if the President had wanted to. I reply there has not been an hour since October 15 when we could not have had peace restored in this country and throughout the world if the Republican Senate had wanted it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They say that the President is directly responsible for the rejection of the treaty of peace. They have spread that libel broadcast throughout the country. They have uttered it upon this floor repeatedly, yesterday and the day before and dozens and dozens of times since this session began. The Republicans on this floor followed the instincts and habits of the Republican Party to be unfair and unjust by deceiving and misrepresenting. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I say here now that the responsibility for the rejection of the treaty, or the acceptance of the treaty with the Lodge reservations, has never been put up to the President. A Republican Senate dared not put it up to him. They wanted for political purposes to say that he was responsible for a failure to restore peace and peace conditions, and yet did not have the courage to give him the chance to take the responsibility of rejection or acceptance of the treaty with the Lodge reservations. When did the treaty with the Lodge reservations or other reservations ever pass the Senate and go to the President? When? Not for a second since the war ended.

They criticize the President because they say he is "bull-headed" and will not take the advice of the Senate. When did the Republican Senate ever advise the President with respect to this treaty? It pretended that it desired to advise him in the Lodge reservations. The Constitution requires, in making treaties, the advice of the Senate. Never has the Senate performed in any way that responsible duty, because, although Republicans in the Senate put the reservations one after another into the treaty, never did they send the required or any advice to the President. When it came to the point of sending it and the Republicans in the Senate had the opportunity, they refused and withheld such advice from the President, and to this day he has not received it. Following, as I said, the instincts and the habits of the Republican Party to be unfair and unjust, they now denounce the President for refusing to take the advice of the Senate which the Senate has never yet had the courage or wisdom to give. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Is the President responsible? The President had in his hand only 20 Democratic Senators' votes. They are the only votes he could control. He could control them absolutely—20. How many Senators are there in this Republican Senate? Ninety-six. Will you not be fair? How could the President's 20 Senators control the remaining 76 Senators? Remember, I want every man and woman in the United States to know this fact, I want the world to know this fact, that the Democratic Party in the Senate furnished to the Republican Party in the Senate 21 votes, enough to ratify that treaty with the Lodge reservations, and send it to the President by not only a two-thirds vote, but a three-fourths vote. Remember this, that when the test vote came the Republican Party furnished enough votes in opposition to defeat the treaty with the Lodge reservations, which they themselves had put in. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is the Republican Senate that is responsible, and directly responsible, for the defeat and rejection of that treaty and for the absence of peace throughout this country and the world to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Republicans in the House want to be fair, they ought to give the facts.

I charge the Republican Party in the Senate with the deliberate rejection of that treaty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I charge the Republican Party in the Senate with the deliberate refusal to give the President an opportunity to accept the responsibility of accepting or rejecting the treaty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Senate never complied with the constitutional requirement by sending the treaty back to him with its advice by a two-thirds vote, and the Republican Party prevented the President from considering their advice or from taking the responsibility of accepting or rejecting the treaty. It is pure, downright hypocrisy, misrepresentation, and deception, it is plain, downright libel, it is downright malicious slander, for the Republican Party, here or elsewhere, to attempt to fix the responsibility upon the President. [Applause upon the Democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, I do not want to be hard on anybody. Sometimes the real, palpable truth makes a man say things that are unpleasant to him, that he does not want to say. I charge, and I am going to prove it, that there is not a line of patriotic sincerity from the beginning to the end of this resolution. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I make the further charge, and I am going to prove it, that every line of it is one of false pretense and hypocrisy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE conceived this resolution in his mind, he knew it was demagogy and hypocrisy. When he put this ridiculous absurdity upon the shoulders of the Republican steering committee of the House, he knew, and they knew, that there was not a line of sincerity in it. Let us see if there is. What did you say, gentlemen? What did all of you say? What does the committee's report say was the reason why they want to pass this resolution? First, to restore trade with Germany; second, to repeal the war-time measures. I am going to show now that there is not a Republican in this House who was sincere when he made that statement; that they were not sincere when they reported this bill out or when they said they favored it; not one. If that is the object of this resolution, it can not become a law, as everyone in this House knows; but if it did become a law those are the only two results that this resolution could possibly have, but in actual fact these results would not follow. As I said a while ago, it can not demobilize the Army, because the Army is already demobilized. It can not bring back the boys from France, because they have already been brought back from France. The only result they say it could have would be the restoration of trade with Germany and the repeal of the war measures. Every Republican must admit that there is certainly some doubt in his mind as to the constitutionality of the resolution.

Now, if you are really sincere, why not bring in a bill in the ordinary and proper and usual way, a bill with respect to which there could be no doubt in the mind of anybody in the United States or anywhere on earth as to its constitutionality. Why not bring in a bill providing, and why have not you done so before, "Be it enacted, and so forth, That the trade relations between Germany and the United States, and the nationals of Germany and the nationals of the United States, are hereby restored as they were before the outbreak of the war?" How simple this would be if you are really sincere. Why not go further and say, second, that all war measures that were to expire on the termination of the war are hereby repealed? To make it absolutely certain, why not have reported a bill repealing specifically each of the war measures that you pretend you want repealed? That is the way to have done it; you would have gotten scores of Democrats to help you pass such a bill through. Senator LODGE when he conceived this scheme, the steering committee when they forced it through the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Foreign Affairs Committee when they considered it and reported it, and every Republican on this floor knew and they know now that it is an absolute impossibility for this resolution to become a law. They know that the President under his oath of office is bound to declare it unconstitutional and veto it. If he should veto it, you know that you can not get enough votes to pass it over his veto; and you know that this resolution is an absolute false pretense—that it can never become a law; and therefore by it you accomplish nothing except an opportunity for fresh deception and more misrepresentation to be used in the coming campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You pretend that you are going to give labor in this country the benefit of the repeal of these war-time measures and the industries the benefit of trade with Germany. Let us see. If you are sincere in a desire to repeal these war-time measures, let me tell you something you could have done. You have had ever since May 19, 1919, to repeal any one or all of them. Dr. FESS, in a speech yesterday, said that is the reason he wanted this resolution passed—to get rid of these war-time measures. He said in his speech on the dyestuff tariff bill some time ago that the Republican Party in the campaign of 1918 promised the people they would repeal these war-time measures and abolish these war-time restrictions. Dr. FESS, let me ask you a candid question. What bill have you introduced since May, 1919, to repeal one of these war-time measures? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. MONDELL, majority leader, let me ask you a plain question. What bill have you introduced to repeal a single one of these war-time measures from May 19, 1919, to this good hour? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. LONGWORTH, what bill have you introduced to repeal any of these war-time measures?

Mr. LONGWORTH. This resolution.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; this resolution; but you have been mighty late about this resolution. I will tell you that they knew they could not pass this resolution and that it never could become a law. If they knew it could become law, they would not favor it. [Applause.] Why did you not bring in a straightforward bill repealing these war-time measures specifically, a bill that was constitutional and that could pass, and why did you not do it before now, during the 12 months you Republicans have had control of the House? [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you or any of you Republicans had or will do so now, and if the President should veto it, I guarantee enough Democratic votes here to pass it over his veto. [Applause.] Mr. PORTER, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and author of this resolution, what bill have you introduced to repeal a single one of these war-time measures that you promised in the campaign of 1918 you were going to repeal? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, where is there any bill that you have introduced and reported out to repeal one of these war-time measures? If there is a Republican in this House who from the 19th of May, 1919, to this good hour has offered a bill to repeal a single one of these war-time measures, let him hold up his hand now.

Mr. MASON. I did.

Mr. SNELL. Right here.

Mr. EDMONDS. I did.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right, gentlemen, you have held up your hands. Here are three gentlemen who say they have introduced them. Why did they not appear before the proper committees and urge them to report their bills out? The fact is not one introduced a bill to repeal the Lever Act or any other war measure. Why did they not get Mr. MONDELL and the steering committee to have them reported out? [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I will not yield right now. You have held up your hand. You are on the Rules Committee. Why did you not get your Rules Committee to report out your bill as it did this resolution? [Applause on the Democratic side.] The bills that these gentlemen introduced no Republican committee has ever seen or heard of. I have never seen or heard of them. They just carried them and dropped them in that basket, and nobody knew they had introduced them. Why did you not call them up? Gentlemen, I will tell you now why the Republicans did not want to repeal any of these war-time measures, and I want every Republican to listen to me, and inside in his heart and conscience he is going to say it is the truth; I do not care what he may say outside. I have shown you that not a Republican in this House wanted or wants to repeal one of these war measures, because if they had wanted to they could have done it at any hour since May 19, 1919. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They could have passed it through this House at any hour since then. [Applause.] They have not attempted to do it, because they do not want to do it.

I can tell you why. I hate to be hard on them. I will risk my salvation—and I have got some faith in the hereafter—but I am going to speak now the simple truth and tell you the reason why. The most unpopular of all the war measures among the farmers throughout the country, among the little business men, the small bankers, the manufacturers, and the merchants, is the Lever food-control act. The farmers and business men of this country have petitioned and written letters to every Member of this House begging him to repeal that act and not let the Government have anything further to do with their private business; not to let the Government go around prying into the smokehouses, the barns, the storehouses, to see whether they have anything hoarded against the provisions of the Lever food-control act. They do not want the fixing of prices. They know that is and has been a sham and cover under which the profiteers have plundered the people.

Now, the Republicans know that if they repeal any war-time measure they must repeal the Lever food-control act first, because it is so unpopular. Why have they not repealed it? Ask the big corporate interests of this country, gentlemen. The Lever Act is the one and only act on the statute books to-day that gives power to the courts to issue injunctions against labor and labor leaders in strikes; it is the only act upon the statute books to-day that permits injunctions to be issued that authorize the imposition of jail sentences against labor and labor leaders. The big corporate interests in this country that employ thousands and thousands have demanded of the Republican leaders in the House and the Senate that the Lever food-control act should be the last act that is repealed, because in these times of unrest and unsettled conditions, this period of great contests between capital and labor, it is the only act by which they can hold a club over organized labor and shout "injunction, contempt proceedings, jail sentences, the Lever Act," and so it is understood that the Republican leaders of the House and Senate are to make that the very last act that they repeal. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They are against the covenant of the League of Nations, but they are in favor of the covenant of the league of corporate interests to protect such interests against labor and labor leaders. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republicans in Congress dare not at this session repeal the Lever Act, because they fear to disobey the orders of the big corporate interests.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, if any man wants to vote for this resolution because it is going to repeal that war-time Lever Act and relieve labor from these conditions, let him not be deceived, for this resolution can never accomplish it. It will never become a law. The President will veto it, and you can not possibly pass it over his veto. Every man that votes for it is voting to deceive labor, because it is impossible to repeal this Lever Act under this resolution and let labor breathe freely once more.

Now, we are going to test these Republicans; we are going to test the sincerity of every Republican in this House. We are going to offer the Republicans a constitutional bill, a bill that I assure you will be signed by the President, and a bill that, if it is not signed by the President, if he vetoes it, we will get enough Democratic votes with the Republicans to pass over his head. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is going to make a motion to recommit the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and the preamble and incorporating your section 2, that proposes to repeal the war measures, and we are going to add to section 2 language so plain that every laboring man, every merchant, every banker, every business man in the United States with common sense, including Republicans [laughter], will know what it is and when it means, and it is this:

Provided, That all acts, joint resolutions, or parts of such acts or joint resolutions which by the terms of the same expire upon the expiration or termination of war are hereby repealed.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The resolution in that motion to recommit will be perfectly constitutional. No man can have any doubt about it. If you help us to pass it, it will be signed by the President, and if not signed by the President it can become a law by passing it over his veto with Democratic help, because we are sincere, and we propose to test your sincerity; prove it by voting for the motion to recommit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I assure you the President will sign it, and if he does not I will guarantee enough Democratic votes to pass it, not only with two-thirds but with three-fourths majority vote, over such veto, and we will write it into law and we will have what you pretend you want.

I want to ask any friend of the laboring man here, Republican or Democrat, will you do something for labor by voting for this impossible false pretense of a Republican resolution, for this consummation of hypocrisy, or will you vote for the plain, straight, manly repeal of war-time measures, as we propose in the motion to recommit? My friends, if you are sincere, and I know some of you are sincere, you can not be honest with yourselves, you can not be honest with labor, if you vote for this false pretense and refuse to vote for the act that will help labor to get relief from injunctions, contempt proceedings, and jail sentences, and will help the small business men throughout the country, the merchants, the farmers to get relief from Government intermeddling.

We are going to test your sincerity. There may be some that are sincere. You could hardly find a body of 245 men, even Republicans, that you could not find some few sincere men among them. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, I do charge you, I brand you, if you vote against this motion to recommit, that will repeal these laws, and vote in favor of your resolution, that will not and can not repeal any of them, because it can not become law, I brand you as an organization of consummate hypocrisy, because every vote you will cast will stamp the brand of false pretense on you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You say you want to restore trade with Germany. You have told the Germans in your districts that you want it so fixed that a German can send money and supplies to his poor countrymen, his needy family and kinsmen over in Germany, and that if you pass this resolution they can do it. Pass this resolution and it is an insult and offense to Germany and the German people and every German-American, because if Germany does not accede under the provisions of this resolution to the terms of a treaty which the Republicans in the Senate have rejected, then it will be an offense punishable by two years in the penitentiary and $10,000 fine if a poor German here, having a distressed family or kinsmen in Germany, should send them a $10 bill or a barrel of flour. Want to trade with Germany! It is an insult to the German people and every German-American. But you know you can not pass this, and you know that if this resolution does become law Germany is not going to and can not accede to the demands of the resolution. Fooling, fooling, deceiving the German-Americans in this country in order to get their votes! Whenever you talk to a German-American about what you are trying to do for him I want that German to say to you, "Hand me your resolution and let me read about that penitentiary offense."

Pass this resolution of the Democrats as amended by the proposed motion to recommit and it will restore the rights of trade with Germany, and it will permit the German here to send money or supplies to his German kinsmen in Germany, because we repeal the embargo and the export war-time acts, as well as other war-time measures.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say just one word now to the Democrats, and then I am going to conclude. We are going to see here to-day an example of so-called party loyalty. My Democratic friends, with the rarest exceptions you are going to see the Republicans to a man vote for this unconstitutional, false pretense, this measure of hypocrisy, and I want to make this solemn, heart-to-heart appeal to my fellow Democrats: If the Republicans in this House are so loyal to party as to be willing to violate their oaths and vote for an unconstitutional proposition, why, in the name of truth and justice, can not the Democrats in this House be as loyal to their party and be willing to vote for a constitutional measure which we will present and not violate their oaths of office? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Take that home with you when you go to your conscience and judgment. Can we not show as much loyalty to party as the Republicans when both propositions purport to accomplish the same thing? The Republican proposition will accomplish nothing, while our proposition, if passed, will accomplish what they pretend and what they declare they want to accomplish, and what every Democrat here actually wants to accomplish, namely, the repeal of the war-time measures. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The Peace Resolution.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. GOODWIN,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, April 9, 1920.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, this debate has, indeed, assumed a wide latitude. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] some two or three days ago essayed to make a great constitutional argument to the effect that after a great war all you have to do is to cease the prosecution of hostilities and automatically, ipso facto, bring about the status quo ante bellum, and peace follows. Why have a peace treaty? is the substance of many of the arguments made by gentlemen on the other side. Why make a peace treaty? If not, why should the President have gone abroad and have taken with him a commission, and after six months succeeded in bringing about a spirit of reconciliation, some thirty-odd nations agreeing to a treaty, agreeing upon terms with the Imperial German Government, if no treaty is necessary? Then why did the Senate of the United States for nine long months haggle and wrangle in a futile effort to bring forth a ratification of the treaty proposed, which it never did intend to ratify? And, if peace should follow without ratification, why did not somebody who believes in that doctrine, even on the Republican side of the aisle, introduce a resolution to that effect more than 16 months ago, inasmuch as the armistice was signed more than 17 months ago? Surely you have a majority of more than 40 on that side. We may propose, but you dispose. Why has not something been done all these months to effectuate this futile thing which you seek to do here to-day if ratification is unnecessary?

The gentleman from North Carolina and others, I think, have properly characterized this resolution. It proposes, of course, to do an impossible thing, and no one knows that better than its proponents, in seeking to bring about peace terms with Germany and compelling her to acquiesce and to function, when the world to-day knows that Germany is in the throes of an awful revolution. She might not be able to do anything politically; she might not be able to accomplish anything economically; but the terms under the third section of this resolution provide that after 45 days, if she does not comply with the terms of the resolution, then all trade relations existing now or that may hereafter exist between America and the Imperial German Government shall come to a final conclusion.

I need not speak of the economic advantage that that will give other countries, because just now it is a matter of procedure that we are discussing, whether, as outlined by the great charter of our liberty, the Constitution, we can do the impossible thing. But, diverting for a moment to the economic theory, it must follow, as night follows day, that in the event of the refusal of the Imperial German Government to comply with the terms of this resolution, whether willfully or not, other nations would set up and rebuild that stricken country. The world to-day, and no part of the world more than Germany, needs billions of dollars of raw material, and no country except the United States is so well equipped to supply the world's wants, including the things that Germany must have.

She needs to be financed. She must get back upon her all fours economically, and there is no one country in all the world one-half as potential in rendering the needed aid as your Uncle Samuel. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In April last year the Chamber of Commerce of the City of New York enunciated the fact that our potentiality is so great, possessing as we do more than one-third of the world's supply of gold, that we can produce as many goods as all the balance of the world combined. The one nation that possibly can take more of our manufactures and our raw materials than any other is the German Empire. By the passage of this resolution all trade relationships, either now or that may hereafter subsist between the two high contracting parties, must under certain conditions come to naught.

But that is not all of that feature of the resolution, Mr. Speaker. Germany can not undertake to do what is required of her, although the German Parliament should attempt to do that which this resolution seeks to impose upon Germany. Germany to-day is absolutely in the hands of the Reparations Commission. What power has that commission? It has plenary power. Germany must go economically and come at the beck and call of that commission. Suppose, for illustration, that the Reparations Commission should say to Germany, "You must not export gold; you must not trade with certain countries; you must do without this commerce; you must initiate all this at home and conserve your gold supply." What follows? She puts an embargo upon gold and upon everything that the commission may arbitrarily then and there dictate and order.

Thus, it seems to me, we are trying to follow a will-o'-the-wisp. We are chasing moonbeams. We are attempting to reach the end of the rainbow, and we will never attain to it, even if the President himself should sanction the resolution, which, of course, he will never do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said that this discussion has gone far afield. Why, they have even lugged in the name of George Washington here. I am surprised, indeed, that the friends of this measure should invoke the sanction and approval of the fathers, knowing that no man that ever lived has been so bitterly denounced as George Washington in America, save and except possibly the present Executive at yonder end of the Avenue. You know that men at all times have been jealous of their rivals and their superiors. But the worst thing ever said yet against the great Washington, in my opinion, was the suggestion by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] that if George were to come down the middle aisle to-day, he would go to bed with him politically; and that he would take a seat along with the Republicans in this House. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, you will pardon a personality. George Washington, you know, was always first in war, but the gentleman from Illinois never was in a scrimmage in his life. When the tocsin of war sounds, the gentleman from Illinois never fails to take to the bushes. The gentleman from Illinois has always been at peace. When the British Empire imposed certain things upon the colonists that they could not endure, then it was that the great Washington drew his stainless sword. But when the war was over it was again sheathed in victory. But the gentleman from Illinois, when a great military autocracy had challenged the integrity of our country, never did draw his sword, but all along during the heat of the controversy, when the fight was heaviest and the mill was grinding hardest, the gentleman from Illinois always appealed for peace, for peace, voting against measures for the successful prosecution of the war, when he knew there could be no peace until the autocratic Government of Germany was vanquished by the prowess of American arms and the supremacy of American valor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has this resolution appraised correctly. It did not receive its birth over here. That resolution, Mr. Speaker, is as a little foundling born out of the bounds of holy wedlock and laid upon the doorway of some other home, to be cared for then and there. This resolution never received its birth in the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. It first saw the light of day somewhere else. And, Mr. Speaker, no real parent should ever disown his own child. No true father should deny the paternity of his own offspring. But this thing, this little outcast which has been brought to the serious attention and consideration of the House, seems to have no pride of ancestry and its father is no single sire. This babe of the woods is the composite product of many Senators. Likewise, through the calling into the case of one Elihu Root, he became its emergent midwife on a hurry-up call for a speedy delivery. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This child, disowned by its parents, was conceived in party stress and depravity and brought forth in political desperation and Republican degeneracy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Indeed, sir, it is a by-product, the refuse, the leavings-over of a nine months' spasm of incubation that began three weeks ago in the crowning statesmanship of another body at the other end of this Capitol, the culmination of a partisan and unholy alliance unequaled in American annals, a conspiracy which in its infancy smells to high heaven and carries with it an odor unlike either the sweetness of new-mown hay or the aroma of the attar of roses. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This child, this unfortunate thing, banished from its own home, was laid surreptitiously one night last week at the doorway of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, an immature, feeble thing, wrapped in swaddling clothes, incautiously labeled "U. S. S." and bearing the laundry mark "H. C. L.," which, by the way, does not stand for the "high cost of living," to which the Republican Party refuses to apply the pruning knife lest it destroy the profiteers and incidentally limit campaign contributions for the fall elections. Were it otherwise, Mr. Speaker, should the claws of the profiteers be finally clipped, that party of ethics, of high ethics, might not be able to Michiganize and Newberryize the election in November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Impostors, Mr. Speaker, should not be permitted to go about the world incognito, lest devils as well as angels be entertained unawares. So that from its face the mask must be torn, that this rancid, this putrid thing, this fake resolution might be known in all its illegitimacy. While the chairman of the committee [Mr. PORTER] admits its paternity, for the sake of his own good name he must not be permitted to father this outlawed child. And right here, speaking for myself and other Democrats, I serve notice that we will not pay any part of its mother's lying-in expenses or any bill that its Republican caretakers or wet nurses may present. We on this side of the House, speaking for an overwhelming majority of its membership, here and now disown and repudiate and denounce it as an interloper in all decent society. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us turn now over this blear-eyed, jaundiced thing and examine other aspects of its cosmos. I challenged its sponsors the other day, Mr. Speaker, in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I again make the challenge to-day to those who favor this resolution, to put their finger upon one jot or tittle, upon one word of Federal organic law, the Federal Constitution, that warrants this House in bringing about a state of peace between America and any foreign foe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is a function for the Senate alone to perform, but that body has deliberately, led by the Republican majority, destroyed all hopes of ratification, and now this feeble subterfuge is brought upon the floor of the House with the hope of fooling the American people. I made that challenge in the committee the other day and to-day I renew that challenge. When we took the oath of office in this very place we held up our hands to high heaven and swore that we would uphold the Constitution and defend this country against all enemies, foreign and domestic. I await an answer now and here to that challenge.

I shall even go further, Mr. Speaker, while the challenge is on; I will challenge any gentleman who favors this resolution to put his finger upon any affirmative action taken in the constitutional debates favoring and sanctioning the action which is undertaken to be had here to-day. I still throw the gauntlet down and ask any gentleman here to accept that challenge, and I still pause for an answer.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I pause for a correct answer.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman let me decide whether my answer is correct?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I yield, but I ask the gentleman not to take too much of my time.

Mr. MASON. Give me two minutes. I claim that under Article I, section 1, of the Constitution, which gives us legislative power, and under Article VIII of the Constitution, which gives us power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, we have this power, and I claim that this resolution, while declaring simply a finding of fact of the state of peace, attempts nothing further except to regulate commerce between Germany and the United States.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I heard the gentleman's speech. He enunciated that doctrine a few minutes ago, and now the mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse. I ask the gentleman when and where in that section to which he referred there is reference to treaties and to war? There is a special provision, so nominated in the bond in the Constitution, that says how you may bring about a state of peace, and that is what this resolution hypocritically pretends to do.

Mr. MASON. No treaty of peace.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman's application is no application at all, because it does not hit the mark.

I will go even further than that and make another challenge, and ask any gentleman to put his hand upon any authority on either constitutional or international law that sanctions what is sought to be done here to-day, and I pause for an answer to that query. The answer is as silent as the voice of the tomb.

Mr. Speaker, what a splendid gathering of men it was that culminated in the work of framing the Constitution of 1787. Only four months did it require to complete their labors, from May until September, 1787. Oh, such a galaxy of big men! Men whom the Lord, I believe, almost inspired and set apart for that divine handiwork. [Applause.] I might call the roll of that convention. I have not the time to do it here, nor do I even recall all the names; but suffice it to say that pilgrimages will be made to the tomb of each and every one of them by the lovers of constitutional liberty throughout all the annals of time. Virginia was there. Mason was there—I mean Mason of Virginia, not of Illinois—although he did not give his sanction to the Constitution. Madison was there, the most conspicuously active figure in the creation of that instrument, and almost the maker of the great Federal organic law. Gouverneur Morris, of Pennsylvania, was there. Old Dr. Ben Franklin, also of the William Penn State, was there, than whom, I believe, few men have ever lived or died who were more versatile; printer, journalist, philanthropist, patriot, statesman, diplomat, philosopher, all combined in one, and no one can recount the good things that emanated from that convention without considering his paternal advice. There were the two Pinckneys from South Carolina, the two brothers. Oh, what luster illuminated that convention! Fortunately for the world, while shorthand was not practiced in those days, Mr. Madison, a most accurate man, took down all the essentials of the debates, made notes daily and wrote them out every night, and his journal is one of the most wonderful books extant, because it gives us the inside workings of the mental attitude of the fathers. But let me read to you what Franklin said.

I will preface that by saying that Mr. Madison was content to make notes of what was said and done without comment, save and except in the last nine lines of his wonderful book. Here is what Mr. Madison says there:

> Whilst the last Members were signing, Dr. Franklin, looking toward the President's chair, at the back of which a rising sun happened to be painted, observed to a few Members near him that painters had found it difficult to distinguish, in their art, a rising from a setting sun. "I have," said he, "often and often, in the course of the session and the vicissitudes of my hopes and fears as to its issue, looked at that behind the President without being able to tell whether it was rising or setting; but now, at length, I have the happiness to know that it is a rising and not a setting sun."

Oh, that a Raphael or a Michelangelo had been there to put on imperishable canvas that inspiring scene! In lieu thereof, however, every American who loves his country and his duty can picture in his own mind the sublime suggestion made by the great Franklin. The time had now come when this precious, this immortal document must receive the signatures of its creators. All night long they had kept the people's vigil, and as the last delegates were subscribing their names the sun was breaking its way over the eastern hills, rising upon the new Republic of the west, nascent in its new birth of baptismal freedom. Oh, the sun rose bright upon America's hopes on that eventful morn, and may that luminary never sink to rest upon her grave.

But, Mr. Speaker, no picture can be made complete without calling to the attention of the House the name of the presiding officer of that great convention, the tallest figure in all the history of the world, Gen. George Washington. [Applause.] Some one—I believe it was a British author—said that Washington was the "greatest of good men and the best of great men." Guizot, the great French historian, said of him that "Washington did, indeed, do four things. He maintained by peace the independence of his country which he had won by war. Out of disconnected fragments he molded a whole, a unity, and made it a sovereign Commonwealth. He achieved his country's independence by the sword; he maintained that independence by peace as by war. He finally established both his country and its freedom in an enduring frame of constitutional government, fashioned to make liberty and union one and inseparable."

These four things constitute the unexampled achievement of Washington. And yet this immortal document, this cloud by day, this pillar of fire by night, we are asked to spit upon, to trample upon, and dump it into the cesspool of polluted politics merely to meet a political emergency, to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for the Republican Party, long since recreant to a constitutional trust. For my part I will not lend myself to any such conduct. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As for me, I refuse to stultify my plighted vow; I refuse to draw the assassin's knife and stab to the heart this covenant that gave us birth; I refuse to discredit the creators of that charter by casting to the winds this covenant of our faith; I refuse to make myself a party to a conspiracy to give death to that whereby we live; I refuse, here and forever, to destroy the hopes, the liberties of the American people by voting for such a cowardly thing as this. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A Personal Rural-Credit System.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. GOODWIN,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, on March 18 last I made a speech in favor of the bill, H. R. 12678, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], for the establishment of a personal rural-credit system. It was only recently, during the present month, that a general circulation of that speech was made, so it is hardly time to obtain a general expression on it; but the favorable replies already received are so numerous that it is out of the question to quote them all. However, some of them are from men with such exceptional opportunities for acquiring information as to the actual needs of agriculture that I must ask your indulgence while I read them. I refer especially to the letter received from Mr. F. L. Houghton, secretary of the Holstein-Friesian Association of America. He has devoted his life to the building up of that association, which his father organized in 1885. Under his management the yearly transfers have increased from 3,000 to over 100,000, and its yearly income now exceeds half a million dollars. He is a man of intelligence, business experience, and rare organizing ability, and few people in this country are better qualified than he to speak of the needs of the dairy industry. He writes:

BRATTLEBORO, VT., June 15, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GOODWIN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with considerable interest your able speech on cooperative rural credit. I am in hearty accord with the views you so forcibly expressed that we must have a broader market for productive farm credit than our present deposit banking or credit system affords. The open market is the safest place for the farmer to go for the sale of his productive credit paper, and the McFadden bill creates the machinery through which the farmer can create and market such paper.

The enactment of this bill into law would be a boon to agriculture, especially to dairying and cattle breeding. It will open the door of opportunity to the educated and industrious young men being turned out yearly by our agricultural colleges, as it will enable the worthy among them to capitalize their abilities, and thus put a stop to the constant inroads being made on farm labor by our industrial centers.

Thanking you for sending me your speech, and trusting this bill may become a law, I am,

Very truly, yours,

THE HOLSTEIN-FRIESIAN ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA.
F. L. HOUGHTON, Secretary.

Prof. E. J. Wickson, of the agricultural department of the University of California, and editor of the Pacific Rural Press, who was a member of the United States Commission on Rural Credits, which went to Europe a few years ago to study the credit systems of those countries, writes:

THE PACIFIC RURAL PRESS,
San Francisco, Calif., April 8, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GOODWIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with keen interest and admiration the exposition of the principles and practices of a proper system of personal rural credit in your speech of March 18.

It is strikingly clear and logical and should have a marked influence in the understanding of this important matter and in securing provision for the speedy organization of it.

Very sincerely,

E. J. WICKSON.

Mr. Chester H. Gray, president of the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation of Nevada, Mo., has taken a very active interest in the subject, and it has been largely through his efforts that the American Farm Bureau Federation, the great and growing young organization which is now seeking to unite the leading farmers of America, came to indorse the legislation and to instruct Mr. Gray Silver, the Washington representative of the organization, to work for the McFadden bill. Mr. Gray writes:

THE MISSOURI FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Nevada, Mo., May 3, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GOODWIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with much interest your speech on the cooperative personal rural credit measure (H. R. 12678), which has been introduced by Mr. MCFADDEN, of Pennsylvania. This measure seems to me one worthy of the support of our State Farm Bureau Federation, and I should be pleased to receive from you the corrected copy of the bill as it now stands for consideration.

Very truly, yours,

CHESTER H. GRAY,
President Missouri Farm Bureau Federation.

Among the numerous letters received from county agents, a class of men with large experience in dealing with the difficulties faced by the farmers of this country and with a particular insight into the inadequacy of our present system to meet the peculiar needs of the farmer, I will quote a typical letter from Mr. R. S. Clark, county agent of Huntingdon County, Pa., to Congressman JONES of that State:

HUNTINGDON COUNTY FARM BUREAU,
Huntingdon, Pa., June 1, 1920.

Mr. E. J. JONES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JONES: Replying to your circular letter of June 1 in regard to the McFadden personal rural-credit bill, allow me to say that I believe that this McFadden bill is an ideal one and needs all the support that we can give it.

I believe that Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas has formed splendid conclusions regarding this bill, and I heartily concur with his thoughts of it. I do not imagine that we should encounter much opposition on account of organized bank capitalists in this bill, but, at any rate, I believe that the rural people will be very much benefited if this bill could be passed.

Very truly, yours,

R. S. CLARK, County Agent.

The above, Mr. Chairman, are but a very few of the many letters received by me and by other Members who have been giving their support to this rural-credit bill.

To sum up the character of such indorsements, I will be brief by stating that this measure is favored not only by the different cattle breeders' associations but the farmers' organizations throughout the country. And should this bill become a law, it will make complete the credits circle of the country.

The time is near at hand when Congress must leave nothing undone following the great wreck of war to revive the latent energies and activities of farm wealth, to bring about greater production to an underfed and undersupplied world, to bring people back from the crowded cities into the open air of God's sunshine, and permit them likewise to become producers of farm products, thus saving the wreckage that now threatens the world in the way of millions of people underfed and undernourished.

Termination of War with Germany.

OF

HON. JAMES A. REED,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, May 14 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 11), 1920.

The Senate had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD as a prelude to my remarks the correspondence between the President and a county chairman in Oregon with reference to the policy of the Democratic Party on the League of Nations, the telegram of the county chairman, Mr. Hamaker, being dated May 6 and the reply of the President being dated May 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post May 10, 1920.]

The correspondence given out at the White House last night is as follows:

The President received the following telegram:

"PORTLAND, OREG., May 6, 1920.

"Primary election May 21. Please wire whether you consider it important to nominate candidates pledged to ratify Versailles treaty without Lodge reservations.

"G. E. HAMAKER,
"Chairman Multnomah County Democratic Central Committee."

THE PRESIDENT'S LETTER.

To which the President has replied:

"WHITE HOUSE, May 9, 1920.

"Hon. G. E. HAMAKER,
"Chairman Multnomah County Democratic
"Central Committee, Portland, Oreg.:

"I think it imperative that the party should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should, therefore, indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations as utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor and destructive of the world leadership which it had established and which all the free peoples of the world, including the great powers themselves, had shown themselves ready to welcome.

"It is time that the party should proudly avow that it means to try, without flinching or turning at any time away from the path for reasons of expediency, to apply moral and Christian principles to the problems of the world. It is trying to accomplish social, political, and international reforms and is not daunted by any of the difficulties it has to contend with. Let us prove to our late associates in the war that at any rate the great majority party of the Nation, the party which expresses the true hopes and purposes of the people of the country, intends to keep faith with them in peace as well as in war.

"They gave their treasure, their best blood, and everything that they valued in order, not merely to beat Germany but to effect a settlement and bring about arrangements of peace which they have now tried to formulate in the treaty of Versailles. They are entitled to our support in this settlement and in the arrangements for which they have striven.

"LEAGUE 'HOPE OF WORLD.'

"The League of Nations is the hope of the world. As a basis for the armistice, I was authorized by all the great fighting nations to say to the enemy that it was our object in proposing peace to establish a general association of nations under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike, and the covenant of the League of Nations is the deliberate embodiment of that purpose in the treaty of peace.

"The chief motives which led us to enter the war will be defeated unless that covenant is ratified and acted upon with vigor. We can not in honor whittle it down or weaken it as the Republican leaders of the Senate have proposed to do. If we are to exercise the kind of leadership to which the founders of the Republic looked forward and which they depended upon their successors to establish, we must do this thing with courage and unalterable determination. They expected the United States to be always the leader in the defense of liberty and ordered peace throughout the world, and we are unworthy to call ourselves their successors unless we fulfill the great purpose they entertained and proclaimed.

'The true Americanism, the only true Americanism, is that which puts America at the front of free nations and redeems the great promises which we made the world when we entered the war which was fought, not for the advantage of any single nation or group of nations, but for the salvation of all. It is in this way we shall redeem the sacred blood that was shed, and make America the force she should be in the counsels of mankind. She can not afford to sink into the place that nations have usually occupied and become merely one of those who scramble and look about for selfish advantage.

"The Democratic Party has now a great opportunity to which it must measure up. The honor of the Nation is in its hands.

"WOODROW WILSON."

Mr. REED. I also shall desire from time to time briefly to refer to certain quotations. I ask permission to insert the quotations at greater length than I shall read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with some hesitation I ask the Senate to listen to anything that I may have to say with reference to the pending so-called Knox resolution declaring a state of peace. I think I should have taken no part in the debate if it had not been for the doctrine announced by the distinguished leader of the proleague forces on the Democratic side. I refer to the body of his speech, and particularly to his colloquy with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Before I come to discuss that I wish to also refer to the oft-repeated assertion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that the Knox resolution is an inconsequential thing. Employing a new and startlingly original phrase, he declared, "The mountain labored and brought forth a mouse." The animal may be very small, but it has occasioned a great rustling of skirts and a pronounced hysteria among the advocates of the league. It has excited the distinguished Senator from Nebraska almost to the point of screaming. It threw the syndicate of international bankers, who want their European bonds guaranteed by the blood and treasure of America, into a state of violent agitation. It produced consternation among that group of business buccaneers who have gazed with greedy eyes upon European fields of exploitation. It brought a disgust amounting almost to nausea to those foreign financiers who had planned to obtain five thousand million dollars more of American money upon their own terms and without adequate security. It produced chagrin and disappointment to those European statesmen who had confidently contemplated the United States as the mandatory of Armenia.

The importance to European countries of the United States assuming a mandatory over Armenia is found in the fact that such a mandatory would have compelled the United States to maintain an army of at least a quarter of a million men in Armenia. I know that the figures have been otherwise stated, but I shall be able to show that a quarter of a million men can not do the work.

These soldiers of the United States would constitute the shock troops necessary to protect against the hordes of Turkey and Asia, Great Britain's newly acquired territories in Mesopotamia and Turkey, and the oil fields she has recently grabbed, which extend from Baku on the Caspian to Batum on the Black Sea. Our troops would likewise be compelled directly or indirectly to defend France in her domination over Syria.

This little army of American boys would also be compelled to withstand the first attacks that will undoubtedly be some day made by Russia when she seeks to recover the land wrested from her.

The enormous military obligations sought to be forced upon us are shown by the declaration of Lloyd-George, made on April 29, that "neither Great Britain nor France nor Italy is willing to undertake a mandate for Armenia, because that would involve heavy military resources for a great conquest if the Armenians are to have anything more than a paper Government." It is also shown by the fact that there has been introduced in the Senate, by a distinguished Senator always close to the White House, a bill providing that an army of 250,000 Americans be placed in Armenia to hold that country in armed subjection.

This legislative mouse, the Knox resolution, probably also has disturbed the equanimity of Japan, because she has hitherto enjoyed the belief that under the League of Nations the great United States would guarantee to her the loot of the Shantung and protect her against the just wrath and probable revenge of China. So much, Mr. President, for the legislative mouse we are now considering.

The Senator from Nebraska takes the position that the United States can not declare a state of peace by solemn joint resolution, to be sent to the President for his signature. At the same time the Senator asserts the new and startling doctrine that if the President makes a speech suggesting a League of Nations, and the Members of the Congress applaud the speech, the country is thereby committed, even as to the greatest of its foreign policies.

Mr. President, I shall put in the RECORD, without reading, because the Senate heard the remarks only two or three days ago, the statements made by the Senator from Nebraska.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that brings me to a necessary consideration of what pledges were made and by whom they were made when we entered the war, and their binding force upon the consciences of the American people, for if we did pledge ourselves to the contents of the pending treaty, then regardless of its consequences we should stand by our agreement and ratify the treaty. But I deny, Mr. President, as earnestly as it is in my power to do so, that any motives save those appearing in the address of the President on the 2d of April, so far as they have been accepted by the Congress, or such as may be found in the legislation of that period, were made or could have been made to the world binding either the representatives of the people or the people themselves, and he who asserts their existence, of course, has the burden of sustaining the charge.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What has the Senator to say concerning the speech of the President delivered to the joint session of the House and Senate on the 8th of January, 1918, in the midst of the war?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have this to say, that the pledges to which the Senator must refer, and the pledges to which the President refers, are those which led us to enter the war. He says so in terms.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a speech of the Executive of the United States, who, by the Constitution, is charged with the sole duty of conducting foreign affairs and of initiating peace propositions. He called the House and Senate into session. He laid down certain purposes of the war. Among those was the formation of an association of nations, or League of Nations, for the prevention of war in the future. That address was delivered officially. It was delivered to both Houses of Congress. It was received with applause, and not a voice was raised, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, in criticism of that pledge of the President for the formation of a league of nations for eight months after it was delivered.

Now, I ask the Senator, under those circumstances, when the constitutional officer of the United States, in the presence of the legislative body, laid that down as one of the objects of the war, had not the world a right to believe that the Nation proposed to live up to it?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator asked me that question, because I know that he believes and has acted upon the belief that it was his duty to recognize that pledge and to make it effectual in the treaty. But if that particular pledge is binding upon the Senator's conscience, and if he thinks that it should be binding upon my conscience as well, were not the other pledges then made equally binding upon the conscience of the President, and why did he virtually abandon them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the President laid down those purposes for which we were fighting he did not lay them down as the purposes for which our associate nations were fighting, and when he got together with them to agree upon terms of peace and the terms of an armistice he could speak only for the United States. He was bound in the very necessities of the case to make such settlement as he and they could together agree upon. Now, he and they did agree to the terms of this League of Nations, and, as I said, in the United States there was not, officially or otherwise, any protest anywhere from anybody against the formation of a League of Nations for eight months after the President proclaimed it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator, like the President, has become obsessed with one of 14 points. That one point is so sharp, so prominent, and so persistent that it has impaled them both; they have lost their sense of perspective, the Senator as an able leader of the treaty forces here, the President as the sole actual representative of the people of the United States at Versailles.

These 14 points, Mr. President, have been harped on for a long time; but inasmuch as the question propounded by the Senator deserves consideration, let us see what they are for a moment:

"1. Open covenants of peace openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view."

There is one of the pledges, if the speech of the 8th of January embodies pledges as the Senator contends, which has not only been forgotten but constantly disregarded. The negotiations were not open; and I do not think they should have been open, let me say, because a public convention of a peace conference in Paris would have been just about as successful as a circus in a Catholic Church. Publicity is impossible where the affairs of nations are being considered and agreements are so difficult to arrive at.

"After which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind."

Mr. President, the world teemed with private understandings during the period covered by the sessions of the Versailles conference. They have been disclosed here, among others, understanding as to Egypt and Persia, the latter being an especially good illustration, against which no protest was registered, even at Versailles, by the American delegation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. "But diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view." I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose the Senator is able to demonstrate that every other one of the 13 points was abandoned by the President; does that prove his statement that there was no pledge for a League of Nations?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; it does not prove that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then why take up the time of the Senate to argue it? The Senator made the statement that there has been no pledge for the formation of a League of Nations. I point him to that speech, and, in answer to it, he undertakes to say that other pledges were made and broken. Is that any reason for breaking this one, even admitting that he is correct, which I deny?

Mr. THOMAS. The President uses the plural. It is the Senator from Nebraska who uses the singular. I am not assailed as dishonoring my country and my party because I have declined to vote for a treaty containing a pledge. It is the Senator, and not I, who seeks to confine this entire controversy to one assurance. I contend that the last of these 14 points is no more important than any of the others, and was no more important at the time they were announced; and all of them succeeded our entry into the war.

The second point was:

"Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed, in whole or in part, by international action for the enforcement of international covenants."

That poor pledge went glimmering almost before it was enunciated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. It was expressly excluded from the note of November 5, 1918, and the President himself said that it did not amount to anything—I do not use his exact language—because it had not occurred to him at the time of its announcement that with a universal league of nations the seas would be free, anyhow. Therefore he turned his back upon this, which, in my judgment, is an essential to the existence and operation of a successful league of nations. Gone? Why, Mr. President, it never came.

I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator claims that there was such a pledge made as he has just recited?

Mr. THOMAS. I am reading from the speech to which the Senator called my attention.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then he, of course, admits that this pledge was made for a League of Nations, which before that he denied.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not denied it at all. I have said it was not proclaimed before our entry into the war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator did deny it before I rose to interrogate him.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator did not ask that question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He denied that the United States was ever pledged to a League of Nations.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator asked me if I regarded the President's speech of January 8 as constituting a pledge of America to the Allies for the war. My reply was that I regarded these pledges, if any, which were made at the time of our entrance into the war, as showing the purposes for which we entered it, and to which the President's last announcement expressly referred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But now I understand the Senator asserts that this pledge which he has mentioned was a pledge. If that was a pledge, then this one referred to by the President was a pledge. I should like the Senator to say specifically whether he now admits that the United States was pledged.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator comes back to his original position, and I ask him how he can otherwise interpret the President's speech, delivered officially in the presence of the Senate and the House, and which went without any question for eight months? If that was not a pledge, what is a pledge?

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator through?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Temporarily. I thank the Senator.

The plain intendment and import of Senator HITCHCOCK'S speech is that because the President, in the month of January, 1918, nearly one year after we entered the war, delivered an address called the "fourteen-points" speech, and in it advocated 14 things, and among the 14 things advocated a League of Nations, and because certain Members of the House and Senate were then and there present and then and there applauded by clapping their hands, this country is bound to accept not only a League of Nations but any kind of a League of Nations the President sees fit to submit.

This is a new and alarming doctrine. If it is to find root in the jurisprudence and legislation of our country we can not too soon learn the fact. If it be true that the President, by mere word of mouth, by a mere verbal utterance, can bind the people of the United States to policies of the most solemn and important nature, then we should use great care in selecting a President.

Mr. President, of all the heresies, of all the absurdities, of all the intellectual monstrosities, of all the cringing and cowardly and un-American doctrines ever uttered by the lips of the sane or the insane, this is indisputably the worst. It was not a haphazard utterance. The same thing has been repeatedly stated in these debates in substance and effect. We have been told that our honor is committed, because the President in a speech said thus and so; that we are bound to pursue a certain course, because the President at some time wrote a letter or gave an interview in which he favored a particular policy. Such a power would have hardly been ascribed by the courtiers of Rome to the most despotic of the Cæsars. Scarcely has despotism ever cursed this earth so cruel that the people have given to the tyrants' speeches the force of law. Caligula, Tamerlane, Pharaoh, Nero, bloody masters of cringing subjects, did not pretend their words were law until they had been formulated and published as decrees.

If this new doctrine is accepted, what becomes of the Government of the United States? What becomes of the Constitution which declares that all powers are vested in the people; that provides for three coordinate branches of the Government; that solemnly stipulates that each branch shall be limited in its authority to the powers expressly granted to it; that does not vest in the President a single legislative function of any kind or nature whatsoever; that confine him in domestic affairs strictly to Executive acts, and in foreign affairs to the simple negotiation of treaties which remain without vitality or force until the breath of life had been breathed into them by the representatives of the people assembled in the Senate? There is but one answer—the Constitution will be obliterated. Liberty will be dead.

Yet a great leader on the Democratic side of the Chamber rises in his seat to announce that if the President comes to Congress and makes a speech, and somebody claps his hands, thereby a hundred million people have been bound and this great Nation has been committed!

Mr. President, if this new doctrine is to be accepted, then indeed we must be wide awake in the future. We must follow the President day by day, step by step, hour by hour. Whenever he gives expression to an opinion we must instantly repudiate it, lest we be estopped by silence!

I do not think the President has ever claimed that. It has been hinted at by others, but the Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the unique honor of first having boldly proclaimed it.

I presume it will be argued that there is a difference between a speech made by the President to the Congress and a speech made elsewhere. Let us examine that. By what right does the President appear before Congress? And what is the measure of his authority?

The sole authority is found in section 3 of Article II. It provides that—

> The President shall give to Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall deem necessary and expedient.

For more than 100 years the method of submission was by a written message. Recently, on certain occasions, the President has seen fit to request the assembling in one room of both branches of the National Legislature, and has delivered his message by word of mouth. Against that I make no complaint, because I believe the President is within his constitutional right, although I wish the old custom had never been varied from, and I hope it will be speedily returned to. Clearly, all the President can do is to submit his views for the consideration of Congress, and whether they are submitted by word of mouth or by written document is immaterial. If we are bound by silence in the one case, we are bound by silence in all cases.

So it comes to this, that if the doctrine announced by the Senator from Nebraska is correct, then if the President sends a message here and we allow it to remain upon the desk for a few days or a few weeks we have thereby acquiesced in it, and it takes on the force and effect of law without any action whatever on the part of Congress, or at least Congress is in honor bound to follow the President's suggestions. I repeat that absurdity can go no further, and it is only because the assertion has been made in this Chamber, where the Constitution is supposed to have interpreters and defenders, that I take anybody's time to comment upon it.

There being no legal authority in the President to bind us by a speech made in the Senate or in the House more than there is legal authority in him to bind us by a speech made anywhere else, I desire to call attention to the peculiar situation in which we would find ourselves were we to adopt the doctrine that whatever the President says immediately takes on the force and effect of a statute, or that at least the Congress is so far committee that in honor it must do the things necessary to carry out the President's ipse dixit.

It will be interesting to see how rapidly we would be obliged to change our position. Perhaps, as a preliminary to that suggestion, I might call attention to the present situation. The argument is that because the President has announced certain doctrines and negotiated a treaty—which is, of course, without vitality until ratified by the Senate—the honor of the country and the Senate are bound. Let us look a little to the origin of that doctrine, to the birth of that thought. I read:

His—the President's—only power to compel compliance on the part of the Senate lies in his initiative in negotiation, which affords him a chance to get the country into such scrapes, so pledged in the view of the world to certain courses of action, that the Senate hesitates to bring about the appearance of dishonor which would follow its refusal to ratify the rash promises or to support the indiscreet threats of the Department of State.

The language I have just quoted is from Woodrow Wilson's "Congressional Government," pages 232 to 234.

It will be observed that in the President's letter to County Chairman Hamaker, as well as in the address of the Senator from Nebraska, the claim is advanced that by reason of the President's acts we are now "so pledged in the view of the world" to the course of conduct marked out by the President that we are in honor bound. That is to say, "The President has gotten the country into such a scrape and so pledged in the view of the world to a certain course of action that the Senate is bound to ratify his rash promises."

The origin of the doctrine now being asserted is clearly traceable to the President's book which I have just quoted.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. McCORMICK. I want to suggest to the Senator that the Senate would have vertigo if it sought to turn often enough to follow the President in any course which he might pursue.

Mr. REED. I may come to that in a little while.

Having shown that Mr. Wilson years ago declared that the President had power "to get the country into scrapes and commit it so that to save the United States' honor the Senate would have to carry out the President's rash promises," I call attention to the President's declaration that he intended to pursue exactly that course.

On March 4, 1919, speaking of the German peace treaty, he said:

When that treaty comes back, gentlemen on this side will find the covenant of the League of Nations not only in it, but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure.

That is to say, that the President declared he would adopt the very policy which in his "Congressional Government" he had asserted might be followed.

Now, after the Senate has twice defeated the treaty because the League of Nations was woven into it, we find the President, in his letter to County Chairman Hamaker, of Oregon, asserting that "the Nation's honor is involved," although that was never pledged, save and except as the President may have "got the country into such a scrape, so pledged in the view of the world to a certain course of action as to bring about the appearance of dishonor if the Senate should refuse to ratify his rash promises."

That this is his position is clearly shown by the threat he made on March 4, already quoted, and by the language of the letter to County Chairman Hamaker, from which I now quote:

I think it imperative that the party should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should therefore indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations as utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor. * * * Let us prove to our late associates in the war that at any rate the great majority of the Nation, the party which expresses the true hopes and purposes of the people of the country, intends to keep faith with them in peace as well as in war.

Keep faith with them on what? On anything to which this country has, in accordance with the law and in accordance with the Constitution, committed itself? Nay, verily; to keep faith with them by carrying out the "rash promises and indiscreet" declarations made by the President upon his own responsibility. With whom, pray, is our honor involved? To whom have we promised a League of Nations?

The President answers the question. I read from his letter.

The League of Nations is the hope of the world. As a basis for the armistice, I was authorized by all the great fighting nations to say to the enemy that it was our object in proposing peace to establish a general association of nations—

And so forth. "To say to the enemy!" The pledge, therefore, is to Germany. Our honor has been pledged to Germany. The specific plea is that we have pledged Germany that we will establish a League of Nations, and that if we do not redeem this pledge to Germany we are dishonored.

Yet, sir, on every platform between Washington and the Pacific coast the President charged that those who opposed the League of Nations were acting in the interest of Germany. The cry "pro-German" has on this floor been hurled at the opponents of the league.

Now we are told by the President himself, and by the Senator from Nebraska, that we must accept the League of Nations because we promised it to Germany; and that our honor is pledged to Germany, because, forsooth, the President, on his own responsibility and without legal authority to bind the country, the Congress, or anybody but himself, made a speech known as the "14 points" speech.

The Senator from Colorado on the day before yesterday demonstrated that 13 of the 14 points have been repudiated or abandoned by the President himself. The single "point" remaining is the one containing the alleged promises to Germany that we would set up a League of Nations. If this is true, Germany is being grossly cheated on the last remaining point, for while the league has been set up, Germany has been kept out.

I pass from that phase of the question, and resuming consideration of the doctrine that the country is bound by whatever the President may say, I remark that what he says outside of Congress is just as binding legally as what he says inside of Congress. Each is alike without force if measured by the Constitution, and each is alike potential under the Nebraska doctrine.

Let me compare some of these statements. As I do so observe to what a contravariety of views our honor has been committed by presidential utterances.

On May 16, 1914, he made a speech in Washington. It was applauded. Accordingly, under the Nebraska doctrine, it bound the country. I read:

John Barry fought like every other man in the Revolution, in order that America might be free to live her own life without interruption or disturbance from any other quarter. You can sum the whole thing up in that, that America had a right to her own self-determined life.

* * * * * * *

There are just as vital things stirring now that concern that existence of the Nation as were stirring then, and every man who worthily stands in this presence should examine himself and see whether he has a full conception of what it means that America should live her own life. Washington saw it when he wrote his farewell address. It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep free from entangling alliances. * * * We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty, and in the confidence and definiteness of our purpose, we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world.

In contrast with the foregoing, I read from a speech delivered by the President in California on September 20, 1919:

Then there is that passion that some gentlemen have conceived that we should never live with anybody else. * * * When men tell you that we are, by going into the League of Nations, reversing the policy of the United States, they have not thought the thing out. The statement is not true. The facts of the world have changed. It is impossible for the United States to be isolated. It is impossible for the United States to play a lone hand, because it has gone partners with all the rest of the world with regard to every great interest that it is connected with.

Nineteen hundred and fourteen, no alliance; 1919, a partnership with all the rest of the world with regard to every great interest.

If the speech on John Barry remained unanswered and unrepudiated, it would have confirmed the policy there announced and fastened it upon our country. According to the new doctrine, the speech of September 20, 1919, is equally binding. Which of these doctrines was right?

Mr. President, I am old-fashioned enough to stand where the President stood on May 16, 1914, and to agree with the President as of that date when he said that the utterances of Washington were not to cover merely transient conditions but that they endure for all time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I observe that the President, in the address which the Senator just read, attributed to Washington the phrase "entangling alliances." Washington did not use that language.

Mr. THOMAS. I never used it.

Mr. LODGE. It was used by Jefferson, as we all know, in his first inaugural. As he was a good Democrat, I think the President ought to have known that.

Mr. THOMAS. Washington's language was, I think, "permanent alliance."

Mr. LODGE. That we should "steer clear of permanent alliance," and might "safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies."

Mr. REED. Again, Mr. President, I find my mind confused in attempting to apply the new doctrine—whatever the President says binds the country. If the doctrine is correct, then we are bound to exact opposites. I read from the President's speech at Tacoma, Wash.:

It is of particular importance to remember, my fellow citizens, at this moment when some men have dared to introduce party passion into this question—

the League of Nations—

that some of the leading spirits, perhaps I may say the leading spirits, in the conception of this great idea were the leading figures of the great Republican Party. I do not like to mention parties in this discussion. I hope that there is not a real thoughtful, conscientious person in the United States who will determine his or her opinion about this matter with any thought that there is an election in the year 1920. And, just because I want you to realize how absolutely nonpartisan this thing is, I want you to forget, if you please, that I had anything to do with it.

* * * * * * *

I am saying these things merely because I want to read the riot act to anybody who tries to introduce politics.

That was September 13, 1919. Now, behold, that audience applauded, so I suppose what the President said became a part of the fixed policy of our country, according to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

But listen to the statement of the President on May 9, 1920:

I think it imperative that the party should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should therefore indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations. * * *

* * * * * * *

It is time that the party should proudly avow that it means to try, without flinching or turning at any time away from the path for reasons of expediency.

* * * * * * *

The Democratic Party has now a great opportunity to which it must measure up. The honor of the Nation is in its hands.

So, Mr. President, the question that was above politics in 1919 is now "the opportunity of the Democratic Party," and the demand is that the league shall be indorsed in the Democratic platform.

Again, Mr. President, I come to the great question of neutrality. At some length I put into the RECORD on a former occasion many of the utterances of the President in favor of the doctrine that the United States should remain neutral in all world quarrels. I shall not repeat at length what I then said, but I call the attention of every man who claims to be a Democrat to the fact that the strongest speech ever made for neutrality by anybody in the world was delivered by Gov. Glynn when he placed Mr. Wilson in nomination for a second term. That speech was submitted to the President before it was delivered and received his unquestioned sanction.

I shall, however, content myself with a few brief statements by the President himself, showing his position on neutrality. He said:

It is your duty to stand off and not let this Nation be drawn into the war.

Woodrow Wilson at Chicago in January, 1916.

Again:

We can show our friendship for the world and our devotion to the principles of humanity better and more effectively by keeping out of this struggle than by getting into it.

Woodrow Wilson, February 12, 1916, at Kansas City:

I can assure you that there is nothing nearer my heart than keeping this country out of this war.

Woodrow Wilson in a statement to the Scandinavians at the White House, March 13, 1916:

There are actually men in America who are preaching war—

He undoubtedly referred especially to Mr. Roosevelt—who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before do—seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of the citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those standards.

Woodrow Wilson at Des Moines, Iowa, February 1, 1916.

Contrast these declarations with his speeches in 1919:

There are no neutrals under the League of Nations.

Article 11 is my favorite article at present. We must mind our own business, but under article 11 we can mind other people's business.

The following colloquy took place between the President and the Foreign Relations Committee on August 19, 1919.

Senator MCCUMBER—

Speaking to the President—

Do you think that if Germany had committed no act of war or no act of injustice against our citizens we would have gotten into this war?

The PRESIDENT. I do think so.

Senator MCCUMBER. Do you think we would have gotten into the war anyway?

The PRESIDENT. I do.

Again:

I believe that Belgium and her part in the war are in one sense the key to the whole structure, because the violation of Belgium was the call to duty which aroused the nations. (Address to the Belgian Chamber of Deputies at Brussels, June 19, 1919.)

The violation of Belgium occurred in 1914 and antedates many of the statements in favor of neutrality which I have read to you. We did not enter the war on account of Belgium; we did not enter the war on account of the sinking of the Lusitania, diabolical as both those acts were; on the contrary, for two years we continued to proclaim the doctrine of neutrality. Moreover, even after Germany had announced the renewal of unrestricted submarine warfare and had warned us off the ocean, the President, in solemn messages to Congress, asserted that we could not enter the war until an overt act had been committed against the United States. Not until that overt act was committed did we declare that a state of war existed.

After commenting upon the facts I have just referred to, the President in his message of February 3, 1917, said:

Notwithstanding this unexpected action of the German Government, this sudden and deeply deplorable renunciation of its assurances, given this Government at one of the most critical moments of tension in the relations of the two Governments, I refuse to believe that it is the intention of the German authorities to do in fact what they have warned us they will feel at liberty to do. I can not bring myself to believe that they will indeed pay no regard to the ancient friendship between their people and our own or to the solemn obligations which have been exchanged between them and destroy American ships and take the lives of American citizens in the willful prosecution of the ruthless naval program they have announced their intention to adopt. Only actual overt acts on their part can make me believe it even now.

If this inveterate confidence on my part in the sobriety and prudent foresight of their purpose should unhappily prove unfounded; if American ships and American lives should in fact be sacrificed by their naval commanders in heedless contravention of the just and reasonable understandings of international law and the obvious dictates of humanity, I shall take the liberty of coming again before the Congress, to ask that authority be given me to use any means that may be necessary for the protection of our seamen and our people in the prosecution of their peaceful and legitimate errands on the high seas. I can do nothing less. I take it for granted that all neutral Governments will take the same course.

We do not desire any hostile conflict with the Imperial German Government. We are the sincere friends of the German people and earnestly desire to remain at peace with the Government which speaks for them. We shall not believe that they are hostile to us unless and until we are obliged to believe it; and we purpose nothing more than the reasonable defense of the undoubted rights of our people. We wish to serve no selfish ends. We seek merely to stand true alike in thought and in action to the immemorial principles of our people which I sought to express in my address to the Senate only two weeks ago—seek merely to vindicate our right to liberty and justice and an unmolested life. These are the bases of peace, not war. God grant we may not be challenged to defend them by acts of willful injustice on the part of the Government of Germany!

In discussing our entrance into the war I can not refrain from calling attention to the President's message of January 22, 1917:

It must be a peace without victory. Victory would mean peace forced on the loser; a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest not permanently, but only as upon the quicksand.

Sixty-six days later he asked us to declare war. How soon the idea that only peace without victory could last was abandoned is shown by his message of December 4, 1917:

Let there be no misunderstanding. Our present and immediate task is to win the war, and nothing shall turn us aside from it until it is accomplished. Every power and resource we possess, whether of men, of money, or of materials, is being devoted and will continue to be devoted to that purpose until it is achieved. Those who desire to bring about peace before that purpose is achieved I counsel to carry their advice elsewhere. We will not entertain it. We shall regard the war as won only when the German people say to us, through properly accredited representatives, that they are ready to agree to a settlement based upon justice.

And so forth.

Mr. President, if the statement that no peace resting upon victory will abide was true on January 22, 1917, it was true on December 4, 1917. But it was a groundless, an utterly impractical dream. The doctrine of December 4 was sound—the only way to end the war was by the conquest of Germany, by bringing her to her knees. That was as true in the first instance as in the last.

But if the doctrine that we are committed by all the President says is correct, then we are in sore straits, for we are bound to two opposites; we embrace irreconcilable theories.

I do not question the right of the President to change his mind. I am only discussing this new and silly doctrine that whatever the President says binds the country. It can hardly do that when it does not even bind the President.

Attend now to the various declarations of the President on woman suffrage. Bear in mind I am merely pointing out the difficulties attending the new doctrine that whenever the President speaks his words bind the country, bind the world, and especially bind Congress.

On July 4, 1914, the President addressed a body of ladies who represented the National Federation of Women's Clubs.

He discussed the constitutional amendment which proposed to grant universal suffrage and said:

You have asked me to state my personal position with regard to the pending measure. It is my conviction that this is a matter for settlement by the States and not by the Federal Government; and, therefore, that being my personal conviction, and it being obvious that there is no ground on your part for discouragement in the progress you are making and my passion being for local self-government and determination by the great communities into which the Nation is organized of their own policy and life, I can only say that since you turned away from me as a leader of a party and asked me my position as a man, I am obliged to state it very frankly, and I believe that in stating it I am probably in agreement with those who framed the platform to which allusion has been made.

Again, on October 6, 1915, the President issued the following statement with reference to woman suffrage:

I intend to vote for woman suffrage in New Jersey, because I believe that the time has come to extend that privilege and responsibility to the women of the State; but I shall vote not as the leader of my party in the Nation but only as a citizen of New Jersey. * * *

My position with regard to the way in which this great question should be handled is well known. I believe that it should be settled by the States and not by the National Government, and that in no circumstances should it ever be made a party question, and my view has grown stronger at every turn of the agitation.

I agreed with that; I probably applauded that. Thereby, I suppose, I am bound; but if I am bound, I should like to have the rule extended so that it will bind other people.

You will observe that up to this time the President had told the country that we should not adopt a constitutional amendment on suffrage. Now, I call your attention to what I think is one of the most remarkable state papers ever produced in America. We were, on the 30th of September, 1918, debating the woman-suffrage resolution in this Chamber. In the midst of that debate the President entered. I read briefly from his address:

I regard the concurrence of the Senate in the constitutional amendment proposing the extension of the suffrage to women as vitally essential to the successful prosecution of the great war of humanity in which we are engaged. I have come to urge upon you the considerations which have led me to that conclusion. It is not only my privilege, it is also my duty, to apprize you of every circumstance and element involved in this momentous struggle which seems to me to affect its very processes and its outcome. It is my duty to win the war and to ask you to remove every obstacle that stands in the way of winning it.

I call attention to this language:

Have I said that the passage of this amendment is a vitally necessary war measure, and do you need further proof? * * * I tell you plainly, as Commander in Chief of our Armies and of the gallant men in our fleets, as the present spokesman of this people in our dealings with the men and women throughout the world who are now our partners, as the responsible head of a great Government which stands and is questioned day by day as to its purposes * * *—I tell you plainly this measure which I urge upon you is vital to the winning of the war and to the energies alike of preparation and of battle.

Mr. President, what was the situation on September 30, 1918, when that address was delivered? In the month of June of that year the terrible advance of the Germans toward Paris had been arrested. More than a million and a half of American boys were on the fields of France or crossing the ocean. Immediately the commanders began sending them into the English and French lines. By the close of the month of June the German military machine had met its master. The retreat of the French and also the advance of the Germans toward Paris had been halted. Then came a few days of steadying, of preparation, and then the boys, many of whom had been in the Army less than two months, proved themselves the masters of veterans. They taught the English and the French and the Belgians on our side and the Germans and the Austrians on their side that an American soldier only knew how to march in one direction, and that was to the front.

Then, sir, came the long months of close and tense struggle. In the early part of September we had 2,500,000 men in France. We had taken possession of a portion of the line, and that portion of the line never moved except it moved toward Berlin. Our fleets made the ocean gray as they plowed the water bearing supplies. There had come, sir, the Battle of the Marne on August 6, in which the Germans were routed; the Battle of the Argonne had been begun, and the Germans had been hurled back upon both flanks, right and left; San Mihiel, with its glories and its heroism, had been recorded in history; Belleau Wood was the scene of an American victory. Germany was in full retreat. Bulgaria had thrown down her broken sword and quit the fight. Her cities were being captured daily. Her armies were dispersed and decimated. Austria, seething with internal revolt, had sued for peace. Germany was beaten, and all the world knew it; the German heart was broken; the German sword was falling from hands that could no longer hold it. Such were the conditions on September 30. Yet on that day the President said we "could not win the war if we did not pass the woman suffrage resolution"; that "it was vitally necessary to the winning of the war." And some of us applauded. Therefore was recorded, I suppose, not only on earth but among the angels as a fixed fact of history that we could not win the war unless the suffrage resolution was passed. The President had said it, and most of you applauded it, and that settled it. I did not applaud. Yet within 30 days thereafter Germany had cried for quarter. Several days were consumed in negotiations. On the 11th day of November the last shot of the war was fired; the battle flags were furled; Germany lay prostrate; and the woman suffrage resolution had not yet been passed. [Laughter.]

It will hardly do to take the position that everything the President says binds the country, fixes the facts of life, and records the events of history. It will hardly do to accept the new doctrine of the Senator from Nebraska that we are bound to adopt the League of Nations because the President advocated it and some of the Members of the Senate applauded, for about the same crowd that applauded the speech in favor of a League of Nations applauded the President when he said we could not win the war unless we passed the woman suffrage resolution.

Of course the passage of the woman suffrage resolution had no relation to the winning of the war. I am not now discussing the merits of woman suffrage. This is what I say—and I said it then—"I give to the American woman too much credit to think that her conduct in this war will be affected to the slightest extent by the passage or failure to pass the suffrage resolution." The hearts of men did not burn with a greater flame of patriotic fervor than the hearts of the women of America. In every home they were busy, the white and tapering finger of the lady of fashion, the grimy hand of the woman inured to toil, were alike busy knitting, knitting, knitting, sewing, sewing, sewing, to produce bandages for the wounded and clothing for the living. And, better than that, there were going from millions of American homes the messages of American mothers and wives and sisters, cheering the boys to battle, inspiring them with Spartan heroism. No woman faltered or hesitated because the suffrage resolution had not been passed.

But, Mr. President, returning to my theme, namely, the contrariety of views the President has entertained and the consequent difficulty of accepting them as infallibly sound. The Democratic platform of 1912 declared:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

The platform was accepted by Mr. Wilson and approved by the voters at the election.

We had passed the law providing for the canal. We had dug the ditch. We had begun to fortify it. We had paid for it with American money. It was dreamed in the brains of great American engineers. It was wrought out by the brawn of American labor. We had passed the law exempting American ships from tolls. It was our ditch. Then, on March 5, 1914, the President came before Congress and insisted that we repeal the law, repudiate the Democratic platform, and yield to the demand of Great Britain that her ships and the ships of all the world should go on the same terms as the ships of America.

I expressed myself regarding the proposition at the time. I do not intend to repeat the arguments then made. It is enough to state that the movement for the repeal of the Panama Canal tolls act was started by British railroads that owned boats that ran through the canal. They wanted their ships to go through free if ours did, because otherwise our merchant marine, our commerce, and our American cities would have an advantage over foreign ships and Canadian cities. The Canadians carried their protest to Great Britain, and Great Britain brought it here. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] was then Secretary of State, and he silenced the British minister's protest. Afterwards the British minister renewed the request, but not until an American Senator [Mr. ROOT] had made a speech on this floor in favor of yielding to Great Britain. This was followed by an expensive propaganda carried on by the Carnegie Foundation, an institution about as pro-

British as anything ever permitted to exist on American soil. Then the President yielded. I refused to repudiate the Democratic platform, even though the President did.

I regarded the platform as a pledge to the American people. It was a pledge of the party and a pledge of the candidate. I did not believe that a pledge to the American people could be fulfilled by repudiating it in the interest of the British Empire.

If the doctrine that everything the President says is binding upon the country, then the instance of the canal tolls shows how we may be bound to opposites.

Again, on January 22, 1917, the President said:

No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that Governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property.

That was applauded. It was applauded by the Senate and by the House Members who were present. Did it thereby become a principle of law binding upon us, binding upon our honor? If so, how shall we answer for the fact that in the treaty of peace the President signed, which we are asked to sanction, the rape of Shantung, the enslavement of 25,000,000 Chinese, the degradation and subjugation of Egypt, and the thraldom of India are all recognized and guaranteed? How shall we answer the cry of Ireland and other oppressed peoples for the right of self-determination, and who appeal to the President's noble words of January 22, if we accept the treaty of Versailles which rivets their claims forever? Again we are bound to opposites.

Mr. President, on December 4, 1917, the President asked us to declare war on Austria. He then made this statement, and we applauded, and therefore by the Nebraska doctrine it became binding upon the American conscience. Let me read it:

We owe it, however, to ourselves to say that we do not wish in any way to impair or to rearrange the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It is no affair of ours what they do with their own life, either industrially or politically. We do not purpose or desire to dictate to them in any way. We only desire to see that their affairs are left in their own hands in all matters, great or small.

Was that binding upon us? Did that mortgage our honor? Did that fix a status that we could not thereafter avoid without dishonor? What did we do? We tore the Austro-Hungarian Empire in twain. Then we dismembered Austria. That great empire—which, as I recall, had over 50,000 population at the beginning of this war—is by the powers of dismemberment reduced to 8,000,000 souls.

Yet if the doctrine that is now invoked by the Senator from Nebraska be true—namely, that because the President declared he favored a League of Nations, therefore the Nation is in honor bound to join the league—then we were likewise bound not to dismember Austria and we have repudiated our solemn pledges. Once more it appears the country is bound to do two things, each exactly the opposite of the other, merely because the President has said two opposite things.

Mr. President, I might proceed with similar illustrations until the cock would signal to-morrow's dawn and not then have exhausted the theme. I denounce the doctrine. I assert that this is not a Government of men; it is a Government of law. I assert that it is not only not a Government of men but that it certainly is not the Government of a man. I solemnly declare that the people of the United States speak only in the manner laid down in the Constitution, and that they can be bound only when their agents are able to point to the language of the Constitution and the law conferring the authority they undertake to exercise.

Of course, he is out of date, dead, and long since turned to dust, yet I want to read a few words from Daniel Webster, once the lion of the Senate. He was discussing the doctrine, then attempted to be asserted, that the President of the United States was the custodian of the rights of the people. In referring to the argument adduced in its support, Mr. Webster said:

In asserting power for an American President, I prefer that he should attempt to maintain his assertions on American reasons. I know not, sir, who the writer was—I wish I did—but whoever he was it is manifest that he argues this part of his case throughout on the principles of the constitution of England. It is true that in England the King is regarded as the original fountain of all honor and all office, and that anciently, indeed, he possessed all political power of every kind. It is true that this mass of authority in the progress of that Government has been diminished, restrained, and controlled by charters—

And so forth.

But with us there never was a time when we acknowledged original, unrestrained, sovereign power over us. Our constitutions are not made to limit and restrain preexisting authority. They are the instruments by which the people confer power on theeir own servants. If I may use a legal phrase, the people are grantors, not grantees. They give to the Government, and to each branch of it, all the power it possesses, or can possess, and what is not given they retain. In England, before her revolution, and in the rest of Europe since, if we would know the extent of liberty or popular right we must go to grants, to charters, to allowances, and indulgencies. But with us we go to grants and to constitutions to learn the extent of the powers of government. No political power is more original than the Constituttion, none is possessed which is not there granted, and the grant and the limitations in the grant are in the same instrument.

Sir, if all this means anything, if it be not empty sound—

That is, the assertion of the doctrine of the President at that time—

it means no less than that the President may do anything and everything which he may expect to be tolerated in doing. He may go just so far as he thinks it safe to go; and Cromwell and Bonaparte went no further.

Mr. President, this new doctrine that "the word of the Executive binds the country" is neither more nor less than a reincarnation of the old despotic creed, "The will of the monarch is the law of the land." With what abhorrence should we regard that old blood-stained dogma!

Out of the night of time we hear the clash of fetters, the groans of slaves, the swish of cruel whips laid on the bleeding backs of men. We behold countless thousands slaughtered to make a holiday for titled brutes who reveled in the lust of cruelty.

At last the votaries of freedom began to lift their heads. They dared proclaim the doctrine of equality. They were executed on a million scaffolds, burned at the stake, imprisoned in dungeons, tortured on the rack, flayed alive, but the awakened soul of liberty could not be dismayed.

Then there came a day when on these shores, where even the wild forests "sang the hymns of freedom," men were inspired with the sublime courage to exclaim, "Give us liberty or give us death!"

In battle after battle they sustained the aspiration of their souls. In freezing snows, in icy streams, in forest depths, in prison ships they suffered and they died to establish here a government of the people. They wrote a Constitution and declared that it was the Constitution of the people; that the people were the source of all authority, right, and power; that the public officers were but their servants, subject to their will, obedient to their demands, at all times limited by the Constitution. They divided this Government and subdivided it in order to prevent the usurpation of power by any man. They rebelled in the first instance because the King of England had asserted the right to impose his will upon them, although even then there was a requirement of parliamentary acquiescence. But now, sir, at the end of it all, surveying the entire field of history, its ghastly fields of battle, where men have died for freedom, its scaffolds and its prisons, its heroes and its martyrs, at the end of it all, we are told that our Government can be bound by the mere utterance of a single individual, and that we must obey and carry out any statement he may make in a speech delivered to Congress. That is the doctrine of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I would not have so long discussed it, but the same heresy has been foreshadowed here and sometimes stated, in substance, by others. I repudiate the doctrine as un-American, undemocratic, as the last word in senile servility and despotic degradation.

In considering the Knox resolution it is well to understand the reasons for which we entered this war as they are expressed in the resolution of Congress. This is true because Congress is the sole authority empowered to declare war. The declaration specifically states that Germany has made war upon us:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared, and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

That state of war was in fact terminated on the 11th day of November, 1918. Since that time no hostile gun has been fired. People have resumed the avocations of peace; commerce, business, industry have taken the place of armed camps and marching soldiery. Notwithstanding this indisputable fact, men stand here and oppose a measure which proposes to do no more than to officially and legally state the facts as they now exist.

What, pray, is the purpose of your hearts? What do you expect to gain?

You will continue upon the statute books laws which were passed with a solemn pledge that when the war was over these statutes would cease to exist. How long will you continue them if this joint resolution be defeated?

The alternative you present is that we shall ratify the peace treaty exactly as the President gave it to us; that we must accept it in toto. When, sir, will that be accomplished? Surely not before the 4th day of March, 1921, for there is no man in his senses who believes that it is possible to secure the ratification of the treaty without most radical amendments by the present membership of the Senate. That membership wil lexist as it is now, save for the act of God, until the 4th of March, 1921. Not a Member changes, save by sickness, death, or resignation, until the day arrives when the President himself goes out of office.

Thus we are to continue this situation until the 4th of March, 1921; and what then? If, sir, the President's dictum is to be followed, if the Democratic Party writes in its platform the demand that it shall accept this treaty without reservation or change, and if the Democratic Party elects every Senator of the 32 who run for office in November of this year, there will still remain in the Senate more than one-third of the membership who will never approve this treaty without radical change or reservation. So that the ratification of the treaty in the form demanded by the President can not come until after we have held two elections. Do you propose to keep the country technically in a state of war until March 4, 1923?

But will the Democrats elect all of the 32 Members? Is there anybody outside a lunatic asylum who believes we will defeat all of the Republican candidates for the Senate? But if we did, I repeat, there would still be 37 men in the Senate who will never vote for the treaty without change or reservation.

How many Democrats will come back if we accept the President's dictum? There are 17 Democrats and 15 Republicans who will go out on the 4th of March, 1921. Of course, a good many Republicans will come back in. I am afraid to say how many.

Mr. President, for the sake of explaining the tabulation, I present a brief epitome of what the various Lodge reservations cover.

RESERVATIONS.

Reservation No. 1: The treaty gives the United States the right to withdraw on two years' notice if it has fulfilled all international obligations. The reservation reserves to the United States the right to judge for itself whether it has fulfilled these obligations.

Reservation No. 2 refers to article 10 and strikes out the obligation of the United States to defend other countries against attack or to use its military forces to preserve their political independence.

Reservation No. 3 relates to mandates and provides that no mandate shall be acceptable except by act of Congress.

Reservation No. 4 makes the United States the judge as to what questions are domestic, thus protecting us from interference by the league with questions which we regard as domestic.

Reservation No. 5 by clear and decisive language preserves the Monroe doctrine.

Reservation No. 6 declines to make the United States a party to the Shantung outrage.

Reservation No. 7 provides that the representatives of the United States to the league shall only be selected pursuant to an act of Congress.

Reservation No. 8 protects us against interference by the reparation commission with the exports of the United States to and from Germany, unless authorized by Congress.

Reservation No. 9 specifies that the United States shall not be obligated to pay any expenses of the league except by act of Congress.

Reservation No. 10 provides that if the League of Nations reduces the size of armies that we may increase ours without its consent when the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

Reservation No. 11 reserves to the people of the United States the right to have commercial relations with the subjects of a boycotted country residing in our midst.

Reservation No. 12 provides that no provision of articles 296 and 297 of the German treaty shall be regarded as authorizing or approving any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of the citizens of the United States.

Reservation No. 13 withholds the consent of the United States to articles 387 to 427, inclusive, which sets up a semi-Bolshevist government of the world in all matters of labor.

Reservation No. 14 provides that the United States shall not be bound by any vote where the British Empire has cast more than one vote.

Reservation No. 15 provides that in consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when self-government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Now, I am going to ask, in view of the President's letter demanding that the party shall make a party issue of the League of Nations without change, in what shape the Democrats whom I am about to call by name will be when they run for reelection, what chance they will have, whether the position the President takes does not insure their defeat. I shall present them alphabetically.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] voted for reservations 3, 5, and 7. I have already set out the substance of these important reservations.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is the victim of this presidential correspondence, voted for reservations 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, and 15—for all of the reservations, I believe, but one. When he faces his constituency and his opponent confronts him with the letter from the President, what will be the chance of Senator CHAMBERLAIN to come back here? He must overcome the opposition of the President and also an overwhelming Republican majority, for his State is overwhelmingly Republican, and he has heretofore carried it by sheer personal popularity. How long can a party live thus controlled? How long can a party live when one man sets up his will as the party law and ruthlessly seeks to destroy all who dare differ in the slightest degree from him? I am now dealing with this as a political situation, because the President, who all along has declared the league to be absolutely nonpolitical, has suddenly reversed himself and by his letter makes it for the first time a political question.

I can not refrain from calling special attention to this direct attack upon GEORGE CHAMBERLAIN. He is as patriotic a citizen, as good a Democrat as lives. He has carried a Republican State repeatedly. He is intelligent, brave, industrious. The attempt to blackjack him is, from every political consideration, indefensible.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. How will he answer his constituency if his constituency follow the presidential edict? He voted for reservations 1, 3, 5, 7, 12, and 14.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] I believe is not running; but even he voted for reservation 3.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is running in a close State. He is one of the ablest men who has ever stood in the United States Senate. I say without hesitation that Woodrow Wilson would not have been nominated for the Presidency of the United States in 1912 if it had not been for THOMAS P. GORE, and I know whereof I speak. But under his oath the Senator from Oklahoma thought it his duty to vote for every one of the Lodge reservations. In all probability he will be renominated. The President's letter may defeat him in the general election.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] voted for reservations 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 11, 12, 14, and 15. How will he answer his constituency if the President be the leader of the party and the Nation, as he claims? When the President has said that those who voted for these reservations voted for the dishonor of the Nation, what reply will he make to his constituency?

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] perhaps can plead that his offense was only a little one. He voted for reservation 3; that is, he voted that the United States should not accept a mandate and assume the duty to hold, by fire and sword, a people in subjection unless Congress said so, and that is the extent of his offending. Yet, according to the President, he voted to dishonor the Nation.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]. What a faithful friend he has been of the White House, and yet, after hearing the debates, when put to it upon his oath, he voted for reservations 3, 5, 7, 10, 14, and 15.

Because I do not want to consume your time, I place in the RECORD the list of other Senators, some of whom voted for substantially every one of the Lodge reservations, all of whom voted for one or more. The list is as follows:

Democratic Senators who voted for the Lodge reservations to the German peace treaty in the Sixty-sixth Congress, second session—reservations for which they voted are indicated opposite their names.

A total of eight not voting for any reservation. From this total BANKHEAD, COMER, SMITH of Arizona, and SWANSON should be excepted because not present.

The terms of 17 Democratic Senators expire March 4, 1921; nearly all are candidates for reelection this fall. (The names of these 17 appear in italic.) Of these 17 only 2 did not vote for any of the Lodge reservations or any of the substitute reservations agreed to. These are MARCUS A. SMITH and OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD. Of these two MARCUS A. SMITH was absent from the Senate.

Truth to tell, sir, all but six Senators voted for one or more of the Lodge reservations, one of those Senators being absent all the time on official business. All but six come under the sweeping condemnation of the President. According to the President, all but six voted to dishonor the land they had sworn to protect. According to the President, all but six put the brand of shame upon the brow of Columbia. If they are thus guilty, they should be incontinently hurled from office. But did they dishonor their country or did they preserve their country's honor? Did they not preserve the sovereignty and independence of the Nation against the machinations of those who prefer the dream of internationalism above the Nation they swore to serve and defend?

Moreover, after the Lodge reservations had been attached and the treaty stood thus stamped all over, fifteen times stamped and branded with dishonor, according to the President, the following Democrats voted to ratify it in that dishonored form: ASHURST, BECKHAM, FLETCHER, GORE, HENDERSON, KENDRICK, KING, MYERS, NUGENT, OWEN, PITTMAN, PHELAN, CHAMBERLAIN, POMERENE, RANSDELL, SMITH of Georgia, SMITH of Maryland, TRAMMELL, WALSH of Massachusetts, WALSH of Montana, and WOLCOTT; and there were a number paired. JONES of New Mexico, GERRY, and SMITH of Georgia were paired. The first two, I feel sure, were paired for the measure as thus dishonored, disgraced, and damned.

The majority of the Democratic Senators so voted, and I state what has several times been declared upon this floor by Senators celebrated for their friendship for the White House, that, excepting those who were against the treaty in any form, there were not more than three Senators who would not have voted for the treaty with the Lodge reservations attached if the President had not interposed his powerful influence to induce them to vote for its rejection.

What a spectacle the Democratic Party will make as it lines up for battle in the next campaign! Here they come, 48 States—and I do not know just where to assign a Senator in this political battle, but I think he ought to be as high as a colonel—every Democratic colonel except three or four voting for the Lodge reservations, and hence voting to dishonor his country. Having so voted, they have got to eat their own votes and repudiate their own words on every platform from which they speak. When one of them rises and proposes to defend the national Democratic platform that declares for the treaty without change or reservation, the interested auditor will be pretty sure to rise and inquire, "Did you not vote to change it and did not the President say you voted to dishonor your country?"

Thus if we accept the President's advice we will start into the fight with leaders who have been honored by the people and who voted under their oaths of office disgraced in advance. Likewise the party record, so far as the party has a record, will have been repudiated.

How is this to be accomplished? The national committee, the managers draw large salaries, and assume to shape the policies of the convention. The chairman names himself to sound the keynote, although that has been an office heretofore filled by the ablest man that could be found in the entire country. Postmasters, United States district attorneys and marshals, all backed by the vast machinery and power of the Government, are to be employed to force a platform declaring for the ratification of the treaty without amendment or change. Such a platform will be the epitaph of the present-day Democracy.

I read:

> There are illegitimate means by which the President may influence the action of Congress. He may bargain with Members, not only with regard to appointment but also with regard to legislative measures. He may use his local patronage to assist Members to get or retain their seats. He may interpose his powerful influence in one covert way or another in contests for places in the Senate. He may also overbear Congress by arbitrary acts which ignore the laws or virtually override them.

I read again:

> He may interpose his powerful influence in one covert way or another in contests for places in the Senate—

And, of course, any other place. Who said that? Woodrow Wilson, in his Constitutional Government of the United States. That is old philosophy. It has been applied to influence Congress. It is being applied to coerce the party convention.

Mr. President, just a further word. How will the Democratic Party defend itself under these circumstances against the assaults of its ancient enemy?

I do not know what platform the Republican Party will write, but I do know that the most sinister influences that have ever controlled or cursed that party—the great financial interests, the great international bankers—have been flirting with the Republican national chairman, Mr. Will Hays, and that his influence and all that financial influence is being exerted to-day to induce the Republican Party to adopt a halfway declaration on the League of Nations.

Surveying the field of the past, I am not unmindful of the fact that generally the evil spirits of the Republican Party have polluted its soul and controlled its policies. But I assume in this instance you may not be seduced. You have been hearing from too many States. At every place where you have had a free ballot and an honest count, where money has not been poured in to a criminal extent, JOHNSON has swept the field; and I think you may be learning something. I hope, for the good of the country, you have; but in what shape will the Democratic Party be when it goes to its defense?

Question 1. The League of Nations covenant gives us one vote and gives the British Empire six votes. It was alleged here in debate that we must accept that situation, because, it was said, if we change this sacred and holy document it would be necessary to reassemble the representatives of the various warring countries in order to ratify the change. Of course, that was not the truth, because the representatives of those warring countries were then in session and have been in session ever since, except Germany, and all they have to do with Germany is to say, "Come over here, Germany," and she is there the next morning; she can not help coming. Besides, it was not necessary to consult Germany. She was not a member of the league and had nothing to do with the changes the members might see fit to make.

Then, it was argued that if we claimed an equality of voting Great Britain and France would not ratify the document in that form, and that we had better accept an inequality in voting power and occupy a position exactly similar to that occupied by a dominion or colony of the British Empire than to lay unholy hands upon the sacred instrument; but since that time France, through her statesmen, has declared that she will accept the document with any amendments we put on it; and Lord Grey, speaking for the British Empire, has declared that it is not only satisfactory to Great Britain that we shall have as many votes as Great Britain but has further declared that our claim is based upon equity and justice. Nevertheless we are to be required to go to the people declaring that we will not accept an equality of voting even when Great Britain says we are entitled to it. We are to have an American President and a Democratic platform and an army of Democratic candidates declaring that they do not want as much for the United States as English statesmen say we are entitled to have.

If that be the case, we had better import a few thoroughbred Englishmen and run them for office.

Question 2. What defense will we make against the charge that we are opposed to the United States reserving the right to withdraw from the league and to determine for herself whether she has fulfilled her international obligations? What defense will we make when it is charged and proven that the treaty leaves unamended the question as to whether or not the United States has fulfilled her obligations under the league and international law to a foreign tribunal composed exclusively of foreigners? What man dare affront the American people with a defense of a proposal so treacherous and traitorous?

Question 3. What Democrat dare stand before his people and assert that the Monroe doctrine ought not to be reserved and saved and preserved by clear and distinct language? That is all that is done by reservation No. 5.

I read it in full:

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

Astonishing as the fact is the President has rejected that reservation and it is denounced as a badge of dishonor.

Question 4. What defense will a Democrat make if we go before the American people declaring against reservation No. 10? What is reservation 10? Article 8 of the treaty provides that the council of the League of Nations shall recommend the size of the armies and navies of the various countries and that once the recommendation has been accepted it can not be changed except by the consent of the council of the League of Nations. That consent can only be granted by the unanimous vote of the council.

Under that provision as written, if we have accepted the recommendation of the league, although an enemy is preparing to invade us, if her fleets are assembling, if her enginery of war is being mobilized, if the sea is black with her pirate craft, were bearing down upon our devoted land, we can not raise another soldier or man another ship without the unanimous consent of eight foreigners sitting on the top of a Swiss mountain in Geneva, the new capital of the world.

What, I repeat, is reservation 10? The reservation is so weak I am ashamed of it, for no country is ever justified in surrendering the right of self-defense. The right to raise armies and to raise navies is as essential to the life of a nation as the right of man to use his arms and his hands to defend life and home. The whole provision of article 8 should have been stricken out.

But what says the reservation? Merely that if the United States shall at any time adopt any plan of limitation of armament proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8, it reserves the right to increase such armament "without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war."

Only in two instances do we reserve the right to increase our armaments; only when the invader is at our gates; only when war is upon us. The President says that to adopt such a reservation dishonors this Nation. We are asked to affirm the President's doctrine at the Democratic convention. Dare we go before the American people declaring that we will surrender the right of the United States to defend itself when war is at its gates and the sword is at the breast of its people unless peradventure it can get the gracious permission of eight aliens sitting over in Europe, each of them the representative of an alien Government, and six of them the representatives of kings and emperors and mikados who hate republics and envy our greatness, prosperity, and happiness?

Mr. President, madness could go no further.

Mr. REED subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in parallel columns certain quotations which I used in my remarks this morning to be printed in the RECORD. They are statements placed in contrast each with the other. I desire to have them so printed as to illustrate the frequency of presidential reversals and the consequent absurdity of the argument that whatever the President says in messages or otherwise binds the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

POWER TO GET INTO SCRAPES. His (the President's) only power of compliance on the part of the Senate lies in his initiative in negotiation, which affords him a chance to get the country into such scrapes, so pledged in the view of the world to certain courses of action that the Senate hesitates to bring about the appearance of dishonor which would follow its refusal to ratify the rash promises or to support the indiscreet threats of the Department of State. (Woodrow Wilson's Congressional Government, 1900, pp. 232–234.)	GOING TO GET INTO SCRAPES. When that treaty (the German peace treaty) comes back, gentlemen on this side will find the covenant not only in it, but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure. (Woodrow Wilson's speech at New York Mar. 4, 1919.) GOT YOU IN A SCRAPE. After the Senate had twice defeated the treaty with the League of Nations, which the President had negotiated, on May 9, 1920, in a letter to the Democrats of Portland, Oreg., the President stated: "I think it imperative that the party should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should, therefore, indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations as utterly inconsistent with the Nation's honor. * * * Let us prove to our late associates in the war that at any rate the great majority party of the Nation, the party which expresses the true hopes and purposes of the people of the country, intends to keep faith with them in peace as well as in war. "* * * We can not in honor whittle it down or weaken it as the Republican leaders of the Senate have proposed to do."
AGAINST FOREIGN ALLIANCES. John Barry fought, like every other man in the Revolution, in order that America might be free to make her own life without interruption or disturbance from any other quarter. You can sum the whole thing up in that, that America had a right to her own self-determined life. * * * There are just as vital things stirring now that concern the existence of the Nation as were stirring then, and every man who worthily stands in this presence should examine himself and see whether he has the full conception of what it means that America should live her own life. Washington saw it when he wrote his Farewell Address. It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep free from entangling alliances. We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose, we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world. (Address of President Wilson at the unveiling of the statue of John Barry, May 16, 1914.)	IN FAVOR OF FOREIGN ALLIANCES. Then there is that passion which some gentlemen have conceived that we should never live with anybody else. * * * When men tell you that we are, by going into the League of Nations, reversing the policy of the United States, they have not thought the thing out. The statement is not true. The facts of the world have changed. It is impossible for the United States to be isolated. It is impossible for the United States to play a lone hand, because it has gone partners with all the rest of the world with regard to every great interest that it is connected with. (From speech of Woodrow Wilson delivered at Los Angeles, Calif., Sept. 20, 1919.)
THE LEAGUE NOT A POLITICAL QUESTION. It is of particular importance, my fellow citizens, at this moment, when some men have dared to introduce party passion into this question, that some of the leading spirits, perhaps I may say the leading spirits, in the conception of this great idea, were leading figures of the great Republican Party. I do not like to mention parties in this discussion. I hope there is not a real thoughtful, conscientious person in the United States who will determine his or her opinion about this matter with any thought that there is an election in the year 1920. And, just because I want you to realize how absolutely nonpartisan this thing	THE LEAGUE IS A POLITICAL QUESTION. I think it imperative that the party (the Democratic Party) should at once proclaim itself the uncompromising champion of the Nation's honor and the advocate of everything that the United States can do in the service of humanity; that it should, therefore, indorse and support the Versailles treaty and condemn the Lodge reservations. * * * It is time that the party should proudly avow that it means to try, without flinching or turning at any time away from the path for reasons of expediency. * * * The Democratic Party has now a great opportunity to which it must measure up. The honor of is, I want you to forget, if you please, that I had anything to do with it. * * * I am saying this merely because I want to read the riot act to anybody who tries to introduce politics. (From speech of Woodrow Wilson at Tacoma, Wash., Sept. 13, 1919.)

NEUTRALITY.

It is your duty to stand off and not let this Nation be drawn into the war. (Woodrow Wilson's address at Chicago, January, 1916.)

We can show our friendship for the world and our devotion to the principles of humanity better and more effectively by keeping out of this struggle than by getting into it. (Woodrow Wilson's speech at Kansas City, Feb. 2, 1916.)

I can assure you that there is nothing nearer my heart than keeping this country out of war. (Woodrow Wilson in a statement to a visiting delegation of Scandinavians at the White House, Mar. 13, 1916.)

There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before—seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water, abandon its habitual and traditional policy, and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I, for one, can not subscribe to those standards. (From Woodrow Wilson's speech at Des Moines, Iowa, Feb. 1, 1916.)

It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggressions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign Government. (Woodrow Wilson's Flag Day address at Washington, June 14, 1917.)

There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight. There is such a thing as a nation being so right that it needs not to convince others by force. (May 10, 1915.)

I have tried to live up to the counsel I have given to my fellow citizens not only to be neutral in action but also to be neutral in the genuine attitude of thought and action. (Feb. 3, 1916.)

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS.

11. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants. (From Wilson's fourteen points, address to Congress Jan. 8, 1918.)

The Government of the United States and the Imperial German Government are contending for the same great object, have long stood together in urging the very principles upon which the Government of the United States now so solemnly insists. They both are contending for the freedom of the seas. (July 23, 1915.)

the Nation is in its hands. (From letter to Democrats of Portland, Oreg., May 9, 1920.)

NONNEUTRALITY.

Senator McCUMBER. Do you think that if Germany had committed no act of war or no act of injustice against our citizens we would have gotten into this war?

The PRESIDENT. I do think so.

Senator McCUMBER. Do you think we would have gotten into the war anyway?

The PRESIDENT. I do. (From meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate with the President, Aug. 19, 1919.)

I believe that Belgium and her part in the war are in one sense the key of the whole structure, because the violation of Belgium was the call to duty which aroused the nations. (The violation of Belgium occurred in August, 1914.) (Address to the Belgian Chamber of Deputies at Brussels, June 19, 1919.)

We are fighting for the liberty, the self-government, and the undictated development of all peoples, and every feature of the settlement that concludes this war must be conceived and executed for that purpose. (Cablegram to Russia May 26, 1917.)

Now we are going to lay all our wealth, if necessary, and spill all our blood, if need be, to show that we were not accumulating it selfishly but accumulating it for the service of mankind. (June 15, 1917.)

Neutrality is a negative word. It is a word which does not express what America ought to feel. (Oct. 11, 1917.)

Under the League of Nations there can be no neutrals. * * * The nations are engaged to maintain the right, and in that sense no nation can be neutral. (Sept. 19, 1919, San Diego, Calif.)

NO FREEDOM OF THE SEAS.

One of the principles that I went to Paris most insisting on was the freedom of the seas. Now, the freedom of the seas means the definition of the right of neutrals to use the seas when other nations are at war, but under the League of Nations there are no neutrals, and, therefore, what I have called the practical joke on myself was that by the very thing that I was advocating it became unnecessary to define the freedom of the seas. (San Diego, Calif., Sept. 19, 1919.)

PEACE BASED ON VICTORY CAN NOT LAST.

It must be a peace without victory. Victory would mean peace forced on the loser; a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which the terms of peace would rest, not permanently but only as upon the quicksand. (Jan. 22, 1917.)

THE WAR CAN NOT BE WON UNLESS WOMAN SUFFRAGE IS GRANTED.

Have I said that the passage of this amendment is a vitally necessary war measure? And do you need further proof?

I tell you plainly this measure which I urge upon you is vital to the winning of the war and to the energies alike of preparation and of battle. (President Wilson's address delivered to the United States Senate Sept. 30, 1918, calling attention of the Senate to ratify the woman suffrage amendment.)

IN FAVOR OF FREE TOLLS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS.

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal. (From the Democratic platform of 1912, on which Woodrow Wilson was nominated.)

The President in many speeches declared that platforms were solemn pledges to be sacredly observed.

PEOPLES NOT TO BE HANDED ABOUT LIKE PROPERTY.

No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that Govern-

PERMANENT PEACE MUST BE BASED UPON COMPLETE VICTORY.

Let there be no misunderstanding. Our present and immediate task is to win the war, and nothing shall turn us aside from it until it is accomplished. Every power and resource we possess, whether of men, of money, or of materials, is being devoted and will continue to be devoted to that purpose until it is achieved. Those who desire to bring peace about before that purpose is achieved I counsel to carry their advice elsewhere. We will not entertain it. We shall regard the war as won only when the German people say to us, through properly accredited representatives, that they are ready to agree to a settlement based upon justice and the reparation of the wrongs their rulers have done. They have done a wrong to Belgium which must be repaired. They have established a power over other lands and peoples than their own—over the great Empire of Austria-Hungary, over hitherto free Balkan States, over Turkey, and within Asia—which must be relinquished. (Message of Dec. 4, 1917, asking declaration of war against Austria, pp. 3 and 4.)

The object of this war is to deliver the free peoples of the world from the menace and the actual power of a vast military establishment controlled by an irresponsible government, which, having secretly planned to dominate the world, proceeded to carry the plan out, without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established principles of international action and honor. (Aug. 28, 1917.)

GERMANY ALREADY DEFEATED WHEN WOMAN SUFFRAGE MESSAGE WAS DELIVERED.

Prior to the delivery of the President's message of September 30, 1918, the following successful allied engagements had taken place:

The allied offensive began July 18.

August 6, Battle of the Marne. The Germans were in full retreat on the Argonne.

September 15, Austria asked for an armistice.

AGAINST FREE TOLLS.

I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree by the Constitution itself with personal responsibility. I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable. * * * I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure. (From President Wilson's address to Congress Mar. 5, 1914.)

PEOPLES WERE HANDED ABOUT LIKE PROPERTY.

Shantung, Egypt, India, Ireland, Persia, Syria, and nearly all of Africa, with their millions of pro-ments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property. * * * Any peace which does not recognize and accept this principle will inevitably be upset. It will not rest upon the affections or the convictions of mankind. The ferment of spirit of whole populations will fight subtly and constantly against it, and all the world will sympathize. The world can be at peace only if its life is stable, and there can be no stability where the will is in rebellion, where there is no tranquillity of spirit and a sense of justice, of freedom, and of right. (Message of Jan. 22, 1917.)

In a message asking for a declaration of war against Austria-Hungary, he said:

"We owe it, however, to ourselves to say that we do not wish in any way to impair or to rearrange the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It is no affair of ours what they do with their own life, either industrially or politically. We do not purpose or desire to dictate to them in any way. We only desire to see that their affairs are left in their own hands, in all matters, great or small." (Message of Dec. 4, 1917, p. 4.) testing people, were handed about as property.

The Austro-Hungarian Empire dismembered and then each kingdom subdivided.

Austria reduced to an area so small that her prewar population of approximately 50,000,000 is now less than 8,000,000.

Temporary Admission of Illiterate Mexican Laborers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following:

[Statement of Hon. A. J. SABATH before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, House of Representatives, on H. J. Res. 271, relating to the temporary admission of illiterate Mexican laborers.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, due to an important hearing before the Committee on Foreign Affairs and my illness I was unable to be present during the entire hearings on this bill, which, I assure you, I regret exceedingly. However, I had the pleasure to listen to the remarks and statements of our colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, of Texas, in behalf of the resolution; also those of our colleague, Mr. HAYDEN, of Arizona, and those of Mr. Mandeville, representing the sugar-beet people, urging favorable consideration of the resolution. I also followed with great interest the earnest statement of our colleague, Mr. Box, of Texas, a member of the committee, and the evidence of Mr. James H. Patten, the representative of the Patriotic Order of the Sons of America, in opposition to the resolution.

Inasmuch as we are about to take a vote, I feel that it is my duty and that I owe it not only to myself but to the committee to express my views upon the principle involved in the proposed legislation. This is the seventh term that I have had the honor of being a member of this committee and during these many years I have heard many discussions and arguments and a great deal of evidence on the immigration and labor questions and I came to the conclusion, after careful study of the subject, that foreign labor is needed to keep up the production and development of our country; that 98 per cent of the immigration has been loyal, beneficial, and needful.

I have frequently stated that it is my honest belief that immigration has been advantageous and beneficial to the country and to American labor because it has advanced the American laboring man to the better and higher position which he to-day occupies.

Mr. White, of Kansas, has splendidly stated "that America was primarily an agricultural country and the great mass of American people have devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits," and even though I admit that to-day America is a great agricultural country and as shown during the past four years was capable of feeding not only our own country, but nearly the entire unfortunate population of Europe, I also wish to point out that America is also the leading manufacturing Nation in the world. Within the last 20 years we have made wonderful progress and our exports of products for the year 1919 exceed our imports from four to five billion dollars, or, to be more explicit, over $4,500,000,000. I admit that our exports during the last four years have been extraordinarily large, but even before the war, as the figures will show, our exports outstripped the imports by millions and millions during the last 10 years.

To be able to continue in this great production, not only in farm products but also in the production of our mills, shops, and factories of raw materials and finished products, labor is required. I feel satisfied that you all will be obliged to admit that fact.

Gentlemen, before the signatures on the armistice agreement had a chance to dry, Great Britain, France, Germany, and Italy had started to regain the trade of the world that America had secured during the war, and it is up to this country to be on its guard lest we lose the advantage gained. Being the richest and the greatest country in the world, with unlimited resources and wealth, we grow and produce more than we can consume and, consequently, we must keep an open market for the surplus. But to be able to do so in the future we will be obliged to compete with the prices of other nations and unless common labor is forthcoming that will be absolutely impossible.

To-day the ships flying the American flag can be seen in every harbor and on every sea. We must not permit the disappearance of America's wonderful merchant marine, but unless we have the labor to till our soil and keep our mills, shops, and factories going, I fear that this is what will happen.

I must admit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that I am not familiar with the need of Mexican labor so urgently appealed for by the gentleman representing the cotton and sugar-beet industry in Texas, Arizona, Colorado, and other States.

I wish to assure you I have no interest in these industries or in any especial industry and, in fact, I would be the last man that would desire to aid the sugar, cotton, packing, or any other industry that has been taking advantage of conditions to boost prices and in a large measure responsible for the high cost of living, to secure cheap labor. During my entire service I have at all times aided and assisted the cause of organized labor and labor in general, and my utterances and votes on the floor of the House of Representatives will bear me out in this assertion. I deplore exceedingly, and am ready to go as far as any member of this committee to prevent large employers or any industry to utilize the immigrant for the purpose of beating down the wage of the American workman.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not help believing the contention of various gentlemen that this labor for which they plead is needed. But not only is the Mexican labor needed for the farms, in the cotton fields of Texas, and in the sugar-beet sections of California, Texas, Colorado, and other States, but I know there is a great shortage of male as well as female labor all over the United States. Many a plant in the city of Chicago and in other parts of the country is handicapped for lack of labor, and they all are clamoring and pleading for relief.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I believe it is our duty to help to increase instead of retarding growth and production, as only in that way can we hope to bring down the high cost of living which confronts the American consumer. However, will it be fair to relieve one section of our country and one or two industries and refuse to relieve the other sections and other industries?

For that reason I feel it to be my duty to move an amendment to the bill, so that not only will Mexican labor be permitted to come, but that more beneficial white labor from Europe be permitted to come to aid and assist in cultivating our fields and in keeping our shops, mills, and factories going. Surely the objections that have been raised with regard to the Mexicans by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Box, can not be successfully raised against the honest and industrious people that we have been receiving the last decade from Europe. I feel that we can safely and to advantage suspend for the time being the literacy test, and thereby permit the entry of the honest agricultural and other labor, even though they be illiterate, as that, I am sure, does not make them less efficient tillers of the soil and workers in the mines, mills, shops, factories, and on the railroads of our country.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion permit me to say that if my advice had been heretofore taken it would not have been necessary for these many gentlemen to appear and plead for the suspension of the literacy test, as I have always maintained that the literacy test does not exclude the educated disturber and trouble maker, the editors of seditious sheets, the teachers and advocates of anarchy, the preachers of discord and opposition to our form of government, but does keep out the illiterate, but honest, laboring people, about 80 per cent of whom come from the rural and farming districts of European countries.

For years the restrictionists advocating the literacy test and other restrictive immigration measures have pointed out the grave dangers to our country from the alien in the event that our country should be forced into war; trying to prejudice the minds of the American people with the contention that our country would not be able to rely upon them and that they would be a source of danger to the Nation. Being acquainted with the peoples of these nations from whom we were receiving the major portion of our immigration in the last 10 and 20 years, I was satisfied that the statements of these restrictive advocates were not well founded, and consequently I have frequently, before this committee and on the floor of the House, assured the country that we had nothing to fear of the immigration we were receiving; that they were of races who loved freedom and liberty and would appreciate our democratic form of government and if opportunity would ever present itself that they would demonstrate that they are appreciative of the hospitality, advantages, and opportunities extended them by this great Nation of ours.

Therefore, I was overjoyed as our country was forced to war that these very people enlisted in such large numbers, offering their services, their lives, and their all for our country, demonstrating their appreciation and showing their love and loyalty to our flag, bearing out my repeated assurances as to their worth to the Nation.

I am satisfied, and the records and statistics will bear me out, that in proportion to the population a larger number enlisted the first 30 days and during the war than the native-born Americans, and that without seeking commissions or places of safety. The only dissatisfaction they expressed was that they could not be sent to the firing line immediately. Yes, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of course there were exceptions, but they were very few. Not only have these foreign born been useful in the Army and Navy, but they were found working without murmur in producing much needed material, steel products, war munitions, and, in fact, in every industry to enable our country to supply its great Army and Navy so that the war could be won in the shortest possible time, and I, as yet, have to find a single case of an illiterate immigrant being charged with causing any disturbance or preventing enlistments in our Army or Navy, or advocating sabotage or joining the I. W. W.'s or of being guilty of sedition.

I make this statement because I feel that I was justified in making frequent assertions in behalf of the immigrant and on the question of immigration.

At some other time it will give me pleasure to insert in the hearings statistics of our production, of our exports, of the growth of our industries, as well as the record made by the foreign-born citizens during the last, and, I hope, the very last war.

The Growth of the Navy Under the Democratic Administration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. OLIVER,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, when the Democratic administration came into power in March, 1913, it was not pleasing to learn that the Navy of the United States ranked a poor third among the navies of the world, and yet confessedly this was true.

It must now kindle the pride of every true American to know that the Democratic administration has so wisely and liberally provided for the upbuilding and enlargement of the Navy that in the year 1923, when the building programs heretofore authorized and undertaken are completed, we will have the foremost Navy in strength and efficiency in the world. Such was the statement made to Congress on March 22 by none other than Mr. BUTLER, the present distinguished Republican chairman of the House Naval Committee. More recently, on June 1, Mr. BRITTEN, another leading Republican member of the Naval Committee, in the course of a speech, confirmed Mr. BUTLER's statement in the following words:

Mr. Speaker, with the assistance of the Office of Naval Intelligence, I have made a very careful comparison between the first-line battleships and battle cruisers of Great Britain and the same character of ships of the American Navy, and I think I can prove without fear of successful contradiction that in first-line 20,000-ton ships of at least 20-knot speed, the United States now has in built and building the most powerful Navy in all the world.

During the years 1916, 1917, and 1918 the United States has made tremendous strides in battleship authorizations, with the result that 1923 will see the American Navy the predominant Navy of the world and capable of defeating the navies of any three nations combined, excepting, of course, Great Britain.

All admit that this permanent position is alone due to the farvisioned and wise legislation of the Democratic administration. In this connection it must be emphasized that since March, 1919, when the Republicans gained control of the Senate and House, not a single additional ship to the Navy has been authorized, and the Navy of 1923, as now authorized, will be solely the product of legislation passed by the Democratic administration.

It was in the year 1916, referred to by Mr. BRITTEN, when that greatest of all constructive legislation was passed by a Democratic Congress authorizing a three-year building program, comprising a total of 156 ships, at a cost of more than half a billion dollars. During the war the construction of this program was necessarily delayed, but its final completion is now promised in 1923.

While I fully agree that our naval supremacy will be unquestionably established in 1923, with respect to all types of ships considered or thought necessary by the navies of the world prior to 1917, yet I wish to remind my Republican colleagues that a solemn responsibility rests on this present Congress, which they control, to provide for an aerial fleet. The General Board and the Secretary of the Navy strongly urged on the Naval Committee before Congress adjourned the importance of immediately providing modern aero carrying ships, to which, I regret to say, a deaf ear has thus far been turned. Our splendid fleet, now built and building, to be completed in 1923, will not give us necessarily the naval supremacy claimed unless lessons of the Great War are now heeded and adequate appropriations made for the aviation requirements of the fleet. It is earnestly hoped that when this Congress reassembles in December next these important needs, so anxiously pressed by the General Board and the Secretary, will not longer be neglected. The Democrats have builded and planned wisely and well, but it was not humanly possible to anticipate all the lessons that the Great War has taught as to naval needs, and something yet remains for our Republican friends to do in the present Congress.

When Mr. Daniels on March 5, 1913, became Secretary of the Navy he found it lacking in matériel, short in its authorized personnel, practically no building ways available at navy yards, inadequate docking and repair facilities, and many urgently unsupplied needs of the Bureau of Ordnance.

Fortunately he found a sympathetic House Naval Committee, one willing to forget politics and to actively cooperate with him and the General Board in correcting the Navy's shortcomings. He has enjoyed the confidence and support of the House Naval Committee, irrespective of party, in a very large way. Let me here give a brief chronological outline of some of the important recommendations and the progress of the first three years of Secretary Daniels's administration, showing how, in advance of the general public opinion, he was ever urging large preparations for naval efficiency, how quickly Congress responded, how alert the Navy Department was in preparing plans and letting contracts for the ships authorized in the great building programs, and how great advanced steps were taken to prepare the Navy for every possible eventuality that might occur.

The Secretary was quick to find that the previous session of Congress had authorized only one new dreadnought and that the authorized strength of the Navy was short over 4,000, and though the previous administration had stated that there were enough midshipmen appointed to the Naval Academy to provide enough officers the Secretary saw that this estimate was incorrect, and his first acts toward strengthening the Navy were (1) to ask Congress to authorize every Congressman to appoint two midshipmen to the Naval Academy, and (2) by travel in foreign lands and an educational policy leading to promotion of enlisted men to secure the full number of enlisted men authorized by Congress. He secured the legislation asked of Congress in the summer of 1913, and enlistments increased so steadily—the number exceeding 5,000—that by the next year 36 more vessels were placed in commission than in March, 1913, and 77 were under construction. The estimates he made in the fall of 1913 were for two dreadnoughts and other new construction. He urged and had passed an act strengthening the Naval Militia and authorizing a Naval Reserve, this being the first time the Navy was ever provided with a reserve of any character. That law as amended in 1916 made possible the enrollment of a quarter of a million men in the reserves when they were needed for war.

In 1914 the Secretary secured an appropriation for three dreadnoughts—three times as many as in the year before he became Secretary of the Navy—and began the policy of providing larger reserves of ordnance than had been appropriated for in any previous year, obtained legislation creating the positions of admiral and vice admiral, secured the right to appoint enlisted men as midshipmen to the Naval Academy, increased the number of officers for engineering duties, and began the first real development in aviation, and obtained legislation creating the Office of Naval Operations.

On May 7, 1915, the Lusitania was sunk; on May 11 the Office of Naval Operations was fully organized; on May 15 the President attended a great review of the Atlantic Fleet at New York, when the Secretary made an address urging the building of a greater navy; on May 28 he addressed an official communication to all chiefs of bureaus directing them to report on their preparedness for war; on May 28 all submarine forces were placed under Admiral Grant, who was instructed to keep them in perfect condition for any emergency; on June 11 he had a conference with naval leaders regarding the expansion of the Navy and plans for a larger naval program; on June 28 he created the Naval Advisory Council to discuss and carry out measures of preparedness; on June 28 he increased the inspection board, and survey was begun of all merchant vessels with a view to their utilization as naval auxiliaries in case of war; on June 30 steps were taken to improve the communication system, which proved invaluable in war; in July the General Board was directed by the Secretary to submit a program "formulated in the most definite terms" for a stronger navy; July 30 the General Board reported that the United States Navy should ultimately be equal to the most powerful navy in the world; in July the United States Naval Consulting Board was appointed, with Mr. Thomas A. Edison at the head; on October 7 the General Board was instructed to prepare "a building program that will continue over a period of five years, with an expenditure of about $100,000,000 a year for five years on new construction only; on October 12 the General Board made recommendations calling for $499,876,000; on October 15 the Secretary submitted estimates for the beginning of the five-year program; on December 1 the Secretary, in his annual report, urged the adoption of the $500,000,000 program for new construction; on December 7, 1915, in his message to Congress, the President urged the big building program, and again the President, in a speech at St. Louis in February, 1916, urged that we should have the most adequate navy in the world.

This speech of the President's did much to mold public opinion for a big Navy, and Secretary Daniels, on May 31, before the House Committee strongly again urged the building of the $500,000,000 program of new construction; on May 25 the big bill was reported to the House; on May 31 occurred the Battle of Jutland; on June 2 the biggest naval bill in American history passed the House; on July 21 the bill increasing the number of ships to 156 and number of men to 97,000 passed the Senate; on August 18 the conferees submitted their final report and it was adopted; on August 29 the President ratified the act; on October 2 bids were invited to build battle cruisers and dreadnoughts; on October 25 contracts were let to build all the destroyers authorized; on November 1 contracts were made for other fighting ships, including scout cruisers; on December 1 the Secretary urged that still more fighting ships be authorized for immediate construction; on December 2 he announced completion of plans for armor-plate factory, the naval gun factory, and big extensions of navy yards.

This brings us up to the year 1917. Every energy of the department had been and was in operation for full preparedness. Stress was laid by the Secretary upon filling up the enlistment of regulars; on February 1 Germany began unrestricted submarine warfare, and on the same day the General Board apportioned merchant ships for war to Army and Navy; on February 3 the United States broke off relations with Germany and the President delivered special message to Congress; on February 4 the General Board made recommendations of steps to be taken in case of war with Central Empire; on February 10 the General Board made recommendations regarding mine forces; on February 14 as to supply of floating mines; on February 21 on additional supply of defense mines; on February 27 the President made special address to Congress on arming of American merchantmen for protection against submarine attack, and the Navy Department prepared to arm vessels, assembling gun crews; March 4 the naval bill passed Congress authorizing the construction of additional destroyers; on March 6 the General Board recommended assembling fleet in Chesapeake Bay, and it arrived on March 27; March 12 the President announced that American merchant ships would be armed and Navy began work of arming them, which gave much protection; on March 13 regulations were made concerning armed guards on merchant vessels; on March 14 the first American vessels armed sailed from New York; on March 20 the Secretary wrote to General Board to outline measures to protect merchant shipping, and on same day it recommended escorting vessels to and from ports, patrol of the Atlantic coast, and joint action with British and French Governments; on March 24 the President issued proclamation to increase enlisted strength to 97,000 men; on March 25 the Secretary sent telegrams to all newspapers asking them to aid in recruiting campaign; on March 28 Admiral Sims ordered to Europe; on April 4 Admiral Mayo directed to organize patrol force; on April 5 the General Board reported on assistance United States could give Allies upon declaration of war; on April 6 war declared and fleet mobilized; April 10 conference at Hampton Roads between British and French and American admirals on how America could render the best and most immediate help; April 11 at conference between Secretary and naval officers and British and French admirals working agreements for full cooperation agreed upon and Admiral Mayo directed to order division of destroyers to fit out for distant service; on April 14 six American destroyers were ordered to Europe; on April 28 Admiral Sims cabled that the British Admiralty and war council had decided that "twenty-odd" American destroyers would suppress and keep suppressed the submarines operating in the Queenstown area; May 1 practically all the destroyers with the fleet had been ordered to fit out for distant service, and the last of June found more than 35 destroyers in European waters.

We were then deep in the war, and the American Navy strained every nerve and ordered the maximum contributions possible to winning the war.

It is well to let the high naval officers who were in command of the fleet speak of its efficiency and preparedness when we were suddenly forced to declare war in April, 1917. I briefly quote some of them. Admiral Mayo, who was in command of the Atlantic Fleet, says:

> When the active fleet arrived in Hampton Roads about the 1st of April after its training period in Cuban waters, it was in the best state of preparedness that it had ever been, and there was a feeling of confidence in the personnel of being able to cope with any emergency; the personnel was, however, on a peace basis, and the transfer of trained personnel for armed guard and other duty was already being felt in a decrease in efficiency. The destroyers that were first dispatched to the war zone, though they were assigned to operations for which they had not been specially trained, showed the effect of their general training by the efficiency with which they at once entered into their new duties.

Admiral Rodman, in command of our ships serving with the British fleet, says:

> I wish to state from having been in the Atlantic Fleet from the time the United States declared war that never in my forty-odd years of service, most of which I have spent at sea, and in the latter part in the North Atlantic Fleet, never have I seen such preparedness and efficiency as obtained in our battleship fleet as at the beginning of and during the war. No ship has ever, in my experience, been absolutely efficient; nor will there ever be one whose commanding officer will conscientiously state that it is 100 per cent so. For this reason every officer who has pride and interest in his command will always strive for greater efficiency. No ship will ever be in absolutely perfect condition for no other reason than that from its complicated design, from the multiplicity and complexity of its machinery and constructive features, it will always require certain repairs, alterations, and improvements to keep pace with new and important inventions and improvements, and for its maintenance and upkeep.

Admiral Plunket, who was director of gunnery exercises and target practice, and later commanded the naval railway batteries in France, said in regard to the efficiency of our gunnery:

> At the end of March, 1917, when we were on the verge of entry into the war, the gunnery was at the highest state of efficiency that it has been in the history of the American Navy.

I have already quoted from two distinguished Republican leaders of the House as to the marvelous growth of the Navy as a result of wise Democratic legislation, statements from high naval officers as to the fleet's efficiency and preparedness early in 1917 have been set out, and I now desire to quote another distinguished Republican leader on the splendid record made by the Navy in the Great War. Certainly no one is better authorized to speak on this subject than the Hon. FREDERICK C. HICKS, another distinguished member of the Naval Committee and a Republican Representative from the State of New York.

The following excerpts are taken from an eloquent address which he made to Congress on February 4, 1919, soon after the fleet's return from European waters:

> Out of the mist and the snow of the morning of December 26 a great battle fleet entered the harbor of New York and in the majesty of its power steamed past the Statue of Liberty. It came as a messenger of a conflict won, a silent victory, but a triumph as complete and overwhelming as any ever won by the American Navy. We are too near the tragic events of the great struggle to write with accuracy and fullness the log of our Navy's brilliant achievements. The complete record of the valor, the heroism, and sublime courage of the officers and men who manned those ships, and the unselfish spirit and devotion to duty of those whose fighting strength at home carried forward the organization which made victory possible, will come only through the perspective of the future. To-day we can but briefly appraise their gallant deeds, but we can and we do, in the name of the Republic, extend to them all our heartfelt thanks. For all time they have earned the gratitude of their country in maintaining the high principles for which our Republic entered the conflict and for which they fought and died. The honor and the glory of the flag were safe in their hands. [Applause.]

In order that Congress may judge of the work of the Navy, let me give, briefly, some interesting figures. Of the 2,079,800 men transported to France since April 7, 1917, 911,047 were taken over in United States transports and 40,499 in other American ships, or 46¼ per cent of the total carried. Forty-eight and one-fourth per cent were conveyed in British ships and 5½ per cent in ships of other nations. Of the total strength of the naval escort guarding all those convoys, 3⅛ per cent was furnished by France, 14⅛ by Great Britain, and 82⅜ by the American Navy. A special testimonial to the efficiency of the convoy operations lies in the fact that not one of the eastbound American transports was torpedoed or damaged by the enemy, and only three sunk on the return voyage.

As Secretary Daniels has truly said:

"The history of the convoy operations in which our naval forces have taken part, due to which we have been able so successfully to transport such a large number of our military forces abroad and so many supplies for the Army, is a chapter in itself. It is probably our major operation in this war, and will in the future stand as a monument to both the Army and the Navy as the greatest and most difficult troop transporting effort which has ever been conducted across seas."

As an indication of the extent of the work done by our naval vessels in the war zone, let me submit the averages of miles steamed per month:

Destroyers	275,000
Mine sweepers	10,000
Mine layers	10,000
Battleships and submarines	90,000
Submarine chasers	121,000
Miscellaneous patrol craft	120,000

Or a total of 626,000 miles per month, and these figures do not include troopships, transports, cargo carriers, or merchant ships plying through the war zone.

During July and August, 1918, 3,444,012 tons of shipping were escorted to and from France by American escort vessels; of the above amount, 1,577,735 tons were escorted in and 1,864,677 tons were escorted out of French ports. Of the tonnage escorted into French ports during this time, only 16,988 tons, or 0.009 per cent, were lost through enemy action; and of the tonnage escorted out from French ports only 27,858 tons, or 0.013 per cent, were lost through the same cause. During the same period 259,604 American troops were escorted to France by United States escort vessels without the loss of a single man through enemy action.

On the day hostilities ceased we had in the service in the various branches over 600,000 men and 9,600 yeowomen and 1,386 women nurses.

At the close of the war approximately 5,000 officers and 70,000 enlisted men were serving in our naval forces in Europe, a number exceeding our total naval strength before the war.

On the day war was declared 197 ships were in commission; at its close there were 2,003, of which 338 were in foreign waters. When Germany surrendered her fleet we had abroad 9 battleships—the New York, Texas, Wyoming, Florida, Arkansas, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, Oklahoma—and 74 destroyers.

In aviation also the Navy won distinction, and well-merited praise can justly be bestowed upon the officers and men for their accomplishments in this dangerous service. During the war we established abroad 2 repair and assembly bases, 4 kite-balloon stations, 18 seaplane stations, 5 bombing-plane stations, and 3 dirigible stations, all manned with Navy personnel, which included 624 officers, 97 observers, and over 15,000 enlisted men.

Let me speak of other achievements of the Navy, accomplishments of incalculable assistance to our fighting forces and potent factors in the final triumph. To avert the submarine menace and prevent the destruction of tankers carrying oil to the allied fleets in the North Sea a great pipe line was constructed across Scotland, thus reducing both the danger and distance of supplying the ships with fuel. This project, so startling to our British cousins, was carried forward to completion with the same energy and quiet determination that characterized every undertaking to which the Navy set its hand.

Over 56,000 American mines had been laid in strategical areas in European waters, the personnel engaged in these activities alone calling for 6,700 men, a dangerous occupation and one fraught with trying hardships and ceaseless toil. But the work of supreme magnitude and importance was the laying of a great mine barage, 25 miles wide and 230 miles in length, from Scotland to Norway, across the deep waters of the North Sea. This daring project had its inception in the Bureau of Ordnance in April, 1917, and called for the planting of upward of 70,000 mines from the surface to distances of 250 to 300 feet below the surface. Owing to the great depths between coasts, in places exceeding 800 feet, a special type of mine had to be devised.

To the achievements of the Navy in erecting great training camps, destroyer and aviation bases, hospital units, in training thousands of men for overseas duty, the arming of merchant ships, the building of a vast fleet of smaller vessels, the construction of great warehouses, the manufacture of heavy guns and their mounts, the production of powder, and the purchasing of enormous quantities of supplies, must be added the most spectacular achievement of all—the repair of the interned German ships.

Let me speak, too, of the great railway battery of 14-inch guns, manned exclusively by bluejackets. These huge guns, built originally for our new battle cruisers, were mounted on great railway trucks. Each gun had a complement of 12 specially constructed cars for the operation of the battery and the maintenance of its crew. There were armored ammunition cars and machine-shop cars, barrack, kitchen, crane, and radio cars, making the battery independent of any permanent artillery base. With a range of 30 miles, these guns were the most powerful of any on the line and did splendid execution in the closing days of the conflict.

No one appreciated more highly the efficient work done by our Navy than did Sir Eric Geddes, of the British Admiralty, who last October paid this tribute to our sea forces:

"I venture the opinion that when the history of this war is written there will be no more glorious page in that history than the one which tells of the work done, the dangers faced, and the privations endured by your Navy in common with the navies of your cobelligerents, and there will be no greater manifestation of the overwhelming importance of sea power in a fight such as this has been. In that manifestation the great American Navy has played a highly honorable and increasingly important part."

As Secretary Daniels has so eloquently said:

"Nations and people, too, that knew of the Navy of the United States only by hearsay or random incident know it now as the organized will of a free people, prompt to heed the call of right against might, tireless in effort, fertile in resource, happy in cooperation, and unyielding till the ultimate goal be won."

[Applause.]

This splendid tribute to our Navy's efficiency is not overdrawn, and the Navy holds to-day a deservedly higher place in the confidence of the American people than in any other period of its history.

In conclusion, let me summarize how the Navy has grown in material and personnel since March 5, 1913. More than 1,004 vessels have been authorized since that date and many of them have been completed. The following list gives the types of ships authorized and ordered:

Battleships	16
Battle cruisers	6
Scout cruisers	10
Destroyers	285
Submarines	120
Gunboats	2
Eagles	60
Sub chasers	341
Mine sweepers	49
Tugs	95
Auxiliaries	20

The present capacity of the navy yards for constructing vessels greatly exceeds the capacity to do such work in March, 1913. At that time there was available but one building slip for capital ships, and this one was at New York, and there was in addition one building slip capable of taking large auxiliaries, such as fuel ships, and so forth. At the present time there are available in the various navy yards and stations facilities for constructing simultaneously 7 capital ships, 18 destroyers, 2 auxiliaries, 7 submarines, and 3 mine sweepers or vessels of similar size. A larger number of the smaller types of vessels could be constructed on existing ways if the number of capital ships was somewhat reduced, since the ways have been designed with a view to caring for the construction of smaller vessels if desired. A number of the ways for destroyers and smaller craft are of a temporary character and may be removed in the future.

We had only 20 dry docks in March, 1913, and none of these of greater length than 732 feet. Nine modern docks have been added since, six of which have sufficient length to take ships of 950 feet in length.

The Bureau of Ordnance has now nearing completion a great composite armor, projectile, and gun plant at South Charleston, W. Va., with many facilities which can be used in common for all materials to be produced. The ultimate per annum capacity of this plant will be 20,000 tons of armor—10,000 tons of major caliber gun forgings, up to and including a 20-foot caliber, and 10,000 tons of major caliber armor piercing projectiles.

The naval proving ground has been greatly enlarged and modernized and the powder factory has a daily capacity of 50,000 pounds, capable of being quickly expanded to 80,000 pounds.

The torpedo stations have been increased in number and greatly enlarged and modernized and are now adequate to supply the needs of the fleet in time of peace.

A mine depot and filling plant, consisting of 11,000 acres, well adapted for the storage, loading, and shipment of depth charges, aerial bombs, and other weapons carrying large charges of high explosives, has been purchased and is rapidly approaching final completion. It will be modern in every respect and thoroughly equipped for this important service of the Navy.

A modern naval gun factory capable of manufacturing 16-inch and larger guns has also been added since 1913. The capacity of this factory is more than double that of the only two commercial companies in this country capable of making 16-inch guns, namely, the Bethlehem Steel Company and the Midvale Steel Company.

A new optical building equipped with all modern machinery for the manufacture of all optical instruments is now owned by the Navy.

With this great enlargement of the Navy it became necessary to increase the enlisted and officer personnel. In 1913 the authorized enlisted personnel was 51,500, which has now been increased to 143,500. The permanent commissioned officer personnel was 2,411, now increased to 8,044. In the Marine Corps the authorized enlisted strength was 9,893 in 1913, now increased to 27,500.

It requires much money to build and maintain a navy, but our own frontage on the Pacific and Atlantic, the value of our overseas possessions, the necessity of protecting the Panama Canal and our merchant marine, and the disturbed conditions of the world make it important and necessary that we maintain a strong and efficient Navy.

Our people earnestly desire an agreement with the nations of the world to limit armaments, to guarantee the territorial integrity of nations from external attack, and sooner or later this hope, now expressed in the League of Nations, will be realized.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HATTON W. SUMNERS, OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, June 4, 1920.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on the 23d day of February the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives to investigate the action of the Attorney General with regard to alleged price fixing of Louisiana sugar. On the 4th day of March the House adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized and empowered to investigate in relation—

First. To the admitted concurrence of the Attorney General in a maximum, agreed, or fixed price of seventeen cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation and of eighteen cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation, made in a telegram dated November 8th last to the United States Attorney at New Orleans, La., or otherwise.

Second. Whether, directly or indirectly, immunity from prosecutions under the statutes against profiteering in any way was given to Louisiana sugar growers or others in the sugar traffic in Louisiana.

Third. The facts and the authority of law, if any, upon which the Attorney General or his representatives or agents fixed, agreed, or concurred in the price of seventeen cents for Louisiana clarified sugar at the plantation and of eighteen cents for Louisiana clear granulated sugar at the plantation, and how such facts were obtained.

Said committee shall report its conclusions to the House at the earliest possible date, together with such recommendations as it may deem proper and desirable to submit. And said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, and shall have the right to report at any time.

Pursuant to that resolution a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House began its investigation, and on the 2d day of June, 1920, three days before the expiration of this session of Congress, the majority members of that subcommittee filed their report. On the day following the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WHALEY] and myself filed a minority report.

The authority conferred upon and the direction given to this subcommittee by the House limited the scope of its inquiry to the official action of the Attorney General, as the chief law-enforcing officer of the United States, with reference to a specific transaction with regard to alleged price fixing of Louisiana sugar. It was in the nature of an indictment preferred against the Attorney General, implying, if not charging, a breach of official duty. But the investigation was scarcely under way until the subcommittee began to bring into the inquiry the whole sugar controversy, seeking to fasten upon the Attorney General and upon the President and upon the Democratic Party entire responsibility for the present prices being paid for sugar in this country. It early developed in the proceedings that it was to be a part of the general campaign of agitation with regard to sugar and concerning which the possibility of political profit has not been one of the minor inspirations. At the beginning of the introductory statement which was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], who appeared in the nature of a prosecuting witness, there was added to the scope of inquiry fixed by the resolution adopted by the House the charge that this violation of official duty and discretion alleged against the Attorney General had enhanced the price of Cuban sugar, and in connection with this charge it was also charged that the present prices of sugar had resulted from the failure of the President to act properly with regard to the purchase of the Cuban crop produced during the year 1919. Unfortunately for the discovery of the truth with regard to the Attorney General's official action, this entire investigation and the proceedings had with regard thereto have not for one moment been free from partisan influence. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], chairman of the Rules Committee of the House, in opening the preliminary debate upon the resolution, began the keynote address as follows: I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, page 3871:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution brings before the House a question that has been agitating the country for 10 years—a reduction in the cost of living. Ten years ago the control of this House was turned over to the Democratic Party.

Then follows the charge that the policy of the Democratic Party could not reduce the cost of living, but he said, referring to sugar, that—it was thought, of course, that if the President by any action of his could specifically save $700,000,000 to $900,000,000 a year to the American people on the one item of sugar, a daily necessity in every household, he would avail himself of that opportunity.

This gentleman bespoke the spirit and laid bare the purpose of this investigation. No seeker for the truth ever chases that spirit to guide him to its discovery, nor did such a spirit ever lead to an impartial conclusion. This investigation, born of that spirit, conducted under its influence, guided by its purpose, in due time reached its predetermined conclusion.

There is raised by this record not only the question involved in the resolution itself, but that of the responsibility of the President and of the Attorney General for the present price of sugar, and all consolidated into the one imputation, the sole, culpable responsibility of the Democratic Party. The whole record made by the majority members of the subcommittee puts itself in motion toward the one objective, the political objective.

There have been two investigations of sugar made by this Congress, one by the Senate and one by the House. The Senate investigation was first. The House investigation drew into its record, from the Senate record, much that was disclosed by the Senate investigation. These two investigations and their records are but parts of the general sugar agitation carried on by resolution, speeches, bills, and investigations.

I have quoted the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I now quote the Senator from Oregon [Senator MCNARY], who was the chairman of the subcommittee which conducted the Senate investigation. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 10, 1919, page 361:

Senator MCNARY. Mr. President, I shall hurry on, as I hope to finish this discussion in a very few moments. I have attempted in a few words to fix the responsibility on the President for the situation.

This has reference to the sugar situation. That was the time when it was presumed to be the business before the Senate, of trying to enact constructive, remedial legislation to meet an admitted serious situation affecting the American people. At the time the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] spoke, the matter before the House was presumed to be, and legislatively was, a resolution to investigate the Attorney General for a specifically alleged violation of official duty. Trying to fasten responsibility upon a Democratic President, trying to fasten responsibility upon a Democratic Attorney General, trying to make political medicine, while a legislative opportunity knocked at the door and the legislative necessity of the people was unattended! Now, let us see what the facts are.

CREATION OF EQUALIZATION BOARD—LICENSE AND CONTROL.

The food control act under which the Cuban sugar crop produced in 1918 was purchased and distributed to the American people was enacted on August 10, 1917, when the Democrats controlled not only the Presidency but both the House and the Senate. Thereafterwards the Sugar Equalization Board was created by a Democratic President. It was incorporated under the laws of Delaware with a capital stock of $5,000,000, and under the authority to purchase, which it exercised, and under the licensing feature of the food control act, it proceeded to purchase the Cuban crop of 1918–19 and to enter into agreements with domestic producers and with refiners under which there was a basis price for the new raw sugar, and a specific charge for refining, and a limitation upon the profits of both the wholesalers and the distributors, all of these being controlled under the licensing power of the food control act.

While there were, no doubt, numerous instances of individual profiteering, the great bulk of the sugar crop was distributed to the American consumer at figures around 10 and 11 cents.

The food control act was one of the numerous war measures. Immediately after the enacting clause these words follow:

"That by reason of the existence of a state of war it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy," to do the things provided for in the bill. And then the bill proceeds to give the President very broad discretionary powers with reference to the doing of certain things when determined by him to be essential to the national security and defense. The act provides in its twenty-fourth section "that the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have been terminated and the effect and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President."

Actual hostilities ended with the armistice of the 11th day of November, 1918. From the time the peace treaty was submitted to the Senate the food control act hung by a thread. When the summer of 1919 had come the peace treaty had not been ratified, but it was clearly in the contemplation of everybody that the matter would be disposed of within the session of Congress. There was a division of opinion in this country as to whether the extraordinary powers exercised by the Government during the war to control by regulations the limits of profits ought to be abolished. The President took the position that during the period of reconstruction those powers affecting the price of necessities ought not to be abolished but extended and broadened in scope. I quote from his message to Congress delivered on August 8, 1919:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS: I have sought this opportunity to address you because it is clearly my duty to call your attention to the present cost of living and to urge upon you, with all the persuasive force of which I am capable, the legislative measures which would be most effective in controlling it and bringing it down. The prices the people of this country are paying for everything that is necessary for them to use in order to live are not justified by a shortage in supply, either present or prospective.

It is a matter of familiar knowledge, also, that a process has set in which is likely, unless something is done, to push prices and rents and the whole cost of living higher and yet higher, in a vicious cycle to which there is no logical or natural end.

* * * * * * *

What we can do we should do, and should do at once.

* * * * * * *

There is reason to believe that the prices of leather, of coal, of lumber, and of textiles have been materially affected by forms of concert and cooperation among the producers and marketers of these and other universally necessary commodities which it will be possible to redress.

* * * * * * *

Let me urge, in the first place, that the present food control act should be extended both as to the period of time during which it shall remain in operation and as to the commodities to which it shall apply.

* * * * * * *

As it stands now, it is limited in operation to the period of the war and becomes inoperative upon the formal proclamation of peace.

And it does not seem to me that we can confine ourselves to detailed measures of this kind, if it is indeed our purpose to assume national control of the processes of distribution. I take it for granted that that is our purpose and our duty. Nothing less will suffice. We need not hesitate to handle a national question in a national way. We should go beyond the measures I have suggested. We should formulate a law requiring a Federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license, or in the conditions under which it is to be issued, specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profits in the method of marketing. Such a law would afford a welcome opportunity to effect other much needed reforms in the business of interstate shipment and in the methods of corporations which are engaged in it; but for the moment I confine my recommendations to the object immediately in hand, which is to lower the cost of living. * * *

This was a message delivered by the President to a joint session of the Congress. In that message he asked for legislation which, if granted, not only would have extended to a time definite the powers exercised by the Sugar Equalization Board, but would have made it possible to put other necessities of life under a control similar to that exercised in the distribution of sugar. Whether these powers ought to have been granted or not, each one is privileged to have his own opinion. But there is no choice of opinion as to whether or not the President asked for these powers, and no choice of opinion as to whether or not this Congress complied with the request. The record proclaims the fact that this legislation was asked of this identical Congress and this Congress refused to grant this legislation looking toward the reduction of the cost of living and looking to a continuation to a definite period of the licensing powers under which the Sugar Equalization Board had held down the price of sugar to the American consumer. That is not a partisan statement. That is a fact. That is a part of this sugar record.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

August 14, 1919, the Sugar Equalization Board suggested to the President the desirability, from a commercial standpoint, of purchasing and distributing the 1919–20 Cuban sugar crop as the 1918–19 crop had been handled. The President did not reply to that letter nor to another letter of the same import written by the Sugar Equalization Board on the 20th day of September, 1919.

As a matter of fact, however, the President, as I have stated, did on August 8 ask the Congress, in a special message delivered in person to a joint session of the two Houses, to extend to a definite period the provisions of the law under which the Sugar Equalization Board had distributed the 1918–19 sugar crop. And this request which the President made in person to this Congress this Congress refused to grant. And while the responsibility for high prices of the necessities of life is being charged by the Congress against the President, the spirit of fairness will not permit the nonconsideration of this effort on the part of the President to obtain from the legislative branch not only the power to hold down the price of sugar, but the power to hold down the price of other necessities by the same sort of control which the experience of the Sugar Equalization Board with reference to sugar had demonstrated to be efficient. Nor can the Congress escape the responsibility for the high prices which have resulted and which could have been prevented if the Congress had granted the power which the President asked the Congress to grant.

Whether there is any relationship between this requested power on the part of the President and the suggestion on the part of the Sugar Equalization Board that the Cuban sugar crop should be purchased and distributed, no record discloses. Why the President did not reply to the letters of the Sugar Equalization Board after he had gone to Congress with the request for legislation which included the power the Sugar Equalization Board required in order to purchase and distribute the sugar crop, no record discloses, or whether, as I say, there is any connection between the two or not, no record discloses. Whether the letters of the Sugar Equalization Board actually reached the consideration of the President, I do not know. Whether there is anything behind the suggestion made by Senator MCNARY (page 108, Senate hearing) that maybe the communications of the Sugar Equalization Board did not reach the President, I do not know. That is a matter of speculation, but there is no ground for speculation about the fact nor any denying the fact that six days before the President received the suggestion from the Sugar Equalization Board that the Cuban crop be purchased he had asked the Congress to enact legislation which would have included the powers which the members of the Sugar Equalization Board testify, both before the Senate Committee and the House Committee, they required before undertaking the purchase and distribution of the Cuban crop. There is no amount of speculation, no amount of appeal to partisan prejudice, that can eliminate that fact. Of course, there can be no limit placed upon the charges and countercharges and deductions which individuals may see fit to make. I do not say there were not some things which the President should have done which he did not do. I do not say that he spoke all to Congress which he ought to have said. But I do say, and I speak by the record, that with regard to that which I have quoted of his request the Congress did nothing and has done nothing except let the situation run wild and criticize the President for the high cost of living which the President warned Congress of and asked legislative help in preventing. That is the record.

I do not say the President is free from responsibility. I need make no apology for him. Let the country judge. But, in common fairness and in due regard for the public interest, let it judge by the record. Congress not only refused to grant this requested legislation, but I challenge any person to point to a single constructive or remedial measure touching sugar to the credit of this Congress, which has been in almost continuous session for practically a year. Those are not mere words; I affirm the fact that there has been no such legislation and I seriously challenge any Member of Congress to take the opposite side. Not only is that true, but when we consider the present price of sugar it would be safe to challenge, generally, anybody to convince any person with any sense at all that this one year's uninterrupted agitation and advertising of sugar shortage by Members of Congress, with nothing done to counteract the influence of that agitation and advertisement, could have had any other effect than to stimulate the price of sugar. That agitation constitutes, as the records show, the sum total of the effective activities of Congress with regard to this matter. I do not exempt the McNary bill. It was never operative for one minute, and stands to-day an unanswerable indictment against the legislative sincerity and the legislative competency of this Congress. I am going to discuss that bill presently. The trouble is that this Congress has been busy during the year throwing its responsibilities into other people's barnyards. But the facts bring them home to roost.

It does not matter whether we are Democrats or Republicans, there are certain fundamentals for which we must all stand. We must stand for justice, for individuals and for officials, and we must hold responsibility where power resides; or, put another way, we must not permit those who possess the power to do a thing to escape the responsibility for its nonperformance; or, if power is divided, no possessor of a part of that power ought to be permitted to escape a corresponding part of the responsibility for the nonexercise of the power, and especially for the nonattempt to exercise the power possessed. We must demand that the critic come with clean hands if he would escape the condemnation which he would have imposed upon others. It is the law of life and it is the law of right. Due regard for the efficiency of the public service, as a matter of their own protection, imposes this necessity upon the people, regardless of party.

THE RECORD IN THE CASE.

Now, let us see what are the facts—the indisputable facts—with regard to this sugar matter and the relative responsibility therefor. If the legislation was requested by the President, if it was refused, and if it was necessary, can anyone be so partisan as to question the conclusion that Congress can not rid itself of responsibility for the result which follows its failure? That is a clear-cut proposition. Can any fair-minded, patriotic person escape the obligation to support it with the influence of his agreement to it? Was it necessary to have this legislation in order to have the Sugar Equalization Board function in the distribution during 1920 of the Cuban sugar crop grown during 1919? That is the important, definite, concrete subject for immediate examination, the decision with regard to which fixes or denies congressional responsibility.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] introduced the first resolution on this subject. That was June 30, 1919. It was a general resolution to investigate the sugar situation, the distribution of which was then being controlled by the Sugar Equalization Board. He testified, however, before the House committee that at the time he introduced the resolution he did not know that the Sugar Equalization Board was in existence. It was upon a later resolution by this gentleman that this investigation of the Attorney General was had. He has made a great many speeches on the subject of sugar shortage. He has worked more persistently, perhaps, than any other person in trying to shift responsibility from Congress and to lead the country to believe that the President, the Attorney General, or some one else is responsible for the sugar situation. Certainly his statement of the situation can not be regarded as prejudiced in favor of the Democratic Party, the President, or the Attorney General, each, both, and all of whom he has been denouncing and charging with responsibility for sugar prices during the past year. True, he has offered no constructive or remedial measure, but that does not differentiate him from the others. He is a stanch Republican. He was the first witness who appeared before the House Judiciary Committee. He was the prosecutor, the gatherer of evidence. He procured other witnesses to appear. His testimony spreads over the first hundred pages of the record of that investigation. Now, clearly it can not be claimed that any statement which he would make with regard to the need for this legislation could be prejudiced in favor of the President, or the Attorney General, or the Democratic Party. I quote from page 31 of the House hearing:

MR. TINKHAM SAYS M'NARY ACT NUGATORY.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I explain, Mr. Chairman, that under the Lever Act the situation was this, that the Equalization Board believed that it would be useless for it to purchase the Cuban crop unless it had the power to license. When the treaty was signed, the Lever Act would go out of operation and then they would have no control; therefore it said, before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, 'If you are going to compel us to do business, extend to us the power to license," and the power to license was extended, as I remember it, until the 1st of April; but the act was practically nugatory, because it was not passed until after the entire Cuban sugar crop had passed into the general market and was without control.

This is not my statement; it is the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], and made under oath. It is the statement of the prosecutor in this investigation. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] states the fact and gives the reason why the Sugar Equalization Board would not proceed under the precarious licensing power carried by the Lever or food control act. He states the fact that the Sugar Equalization Board asked this Congress for a definite licensing power, and he states the fact that the Congress responded to that request with an act which was practically nugatory, because it did not arrive at legislative maturity until the Cuban crop had been sold. Does not the admission made by this distinguished gentleman, "against interest," entitle me to the inclination of judgment, at least, that thus far there rests under my statements the foundation of facts? And when we shall have finished the examination of the McNary Act, which embodies the sum total of the legislatively expressed interest and the sum total of the displayed legislative genius of this Congress with regard to sugar prices, you will wonder why so much energy should have been expended in resoluting, speech making, and agitating and so little energy expended in remedial constructive help by the great Congress of this Nation. Their eyes saw not their duty which lay at their feet because their eyes were looking toward the first Tuesday of next November. That has been the trouble.

This investigation is a part of the general political agitation with regard to sugar which for months has been carried on in this country, the clear objective of which has been, and is, to fasten responsibility upon the Democratic Party for sugar prices, and to politically capitalize the general discontent with regard to those prices. This investigation ran the whole limit and covered the whole field of effort in this regard.

Gentlemen may try to explain those things with regard to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has testified and to sidestep, but it can not be done. They are facts—facts of record. Nor is there any escape from the imputation of insincerity and legislative incompetency which those facts clinch upon the Congress. Remember, we are dealing with this Republican Congress, with its Republican steering committee and its Republican-controlled Rules Committee, the function and the power of which is to keep legislation under complete control of the Republican majority. These are the gentlemen who have made this a political issue and in their desperation have sought to destroy the reputation for official integrity of individual officers of the opposite faith. As persuasive as is the testimony of the gentleman from Massachusetts, given against the interest of his position and of his party, the importance of the particular matter under consideration, not alone to the officials involved but to the country, which wants to know the truth and to compel those who have the power to bear the responsibility incident to that power, suggests the advisability of seeing what the other witnesses who testified before the committees of the House and Senate have had to say on this point, and particularly the members of the Sugar Equalization Board.

Mr. Glasgow, a member of the board and the attorney for the board, states on page 99 of the Senate hearing, as follows:

Mr. GLASGOW. Our position is certainly clear, and I want it to be made clear, if I can, that if you gentlemen determine that we ought to buy this crop, give us the powers that are absolutely essential to carry it out; if you determine it is undesirable to buy this crop, then do not make the purchase and let the refiners buy if they can in the markets upon terms.

Senator MCNARY. Upon that point—and I think it very vital—if Congress simply authorized the Sugar Equalization Board and gave it the power to acquire the balance of the Cuban crop, you would not desire to function unless you had the power of license and the power of placing embargoes?

Mr. GLASGOW. Absolutely. We have got to control the refiners in the United States in order to accomplish any good by the purchase of that crop.

Senator MCNARY. You have operated the last two years under the license system, have you not?

Mr. GLASGOW. Oh, yes. We can not keep the refiners together unless we have the control.

Now, bear in mind that the only power which, it is claimed, the President could have given when the matter was submitted to him was to purchase the Cuban crop. As a matter of fact, the Sugar Equalization Board had the power already. The Sugar Equalization Board is a private corporation and these gentlemen constituted its board of directors. The power to grant to it the authority to control distribution through a definite time belonged exclusively to the Congress, and it will be noted that Mr. Glasgow testified that the Sugar Equalization Board would not desire to purchase the Cuban crop unless the Congress gave to it the power to license. They required a power to license covering a definite time, sufficient to distribute the sugar, as distinguished from the power conferred by the food control act, which terminates with the proclamation of peace, and besides they wanted Congress to indorse the purchase. Mr. Zabriskie, president of the Sugar Equalization Board, testified to the same effect (p. 50 of the Senate hearing). Mr. Zabriskie further explained his position with regard to this matter on page 111 of the Senate hearing, from which I quote:

Senator MCNARY. I wish you would state briefly, Mr. Zabriskie, whether you think it necessary for legislation to contain a licensing provision.

Mr. ZABRISKIE. I feel that we can not render the service that is expected of us in the interests of the American consumer unless we are in a position to control the sale of sugar from the refiner to the wholesale dealer or the retail dealer doing a business of over $100,000 a year.

On page 114 of the House hearing Mr. Zabriskie, testifying with regard to the necessity for the licensing power, said:

Mr. ZABRISKIE. There would have been no benefit in purchasing the Cuban crop if we had simply purchased the Cuban crop and turned it over to the speculators; they might just as well have purchased it themselves.

I quote again from the record of the Senate hearing, page 105:

The CHAIRMAN. Is it your belief also, Judge, that unless we have a licensing system that we could not effectively handle the sugar crop and that we had better stay out of it and not buy it?

Mr. GLASGOW. I think, Senator, if we do not have the control which we have put in this bill—I do not say license; I say license and embargo—it is possible you might get through without the embargo, but it would be very useful right now, if we had it, to keep sugar in this country.

But, I say, if we do not have the power of control in the form of the license and the embargo I can not see anything to be accomplished by putting the United States Sugar Equalization Board into the act of purchasing the sugar crop of Cuba. Better let the refiners go and purchase it, and there is no place for the Sugar Equalization Board to effectively operate in behalf of the United States and its people.

On page 106:

Senator McNARY. Briefly, Judge, the Sugar Equalization Board does not desire to continue its efforts to control the sugar situation or acquire the 1920 Cuban crop, unless Congress shall enact about such a bill as proposed in the Senate October 19, known as 2919, which was prepared by you?

Mr. GLASGOW. In my judgment, and I believe the board concurs with me, we can not accomplish any good otherwise.

Senator McNARY. Let me ask Mr. Zabriskie the same question.

Mr. ZABRISKIE. There is no question about that; it is absolutely imperative.

On page 107:

Senator NORRIS. You did have authority without any additional legislation to buy the Cuban crop, did you not?

Mr. Glasgow explained that they did have authority because the Sugar Equalization Board was a Delaware corporation, but that it did not buy it because "we did not know whether we could successfully carry out the purposes of the Sugar Equalization Board unless Congress gave us the power to regulate through the refiners and the wholesale dealers the distribution of the sugar."

Senator NORRIS. Ought not the crop been bought before this?

Mr. GLASGOW. Not unless we had that power.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GLASGOW. But, Senator, do you think we would go down there and buy 3,000,000 tons of sugar when our power to dispose of it depended on having the control, when the act might drop any time you gentlemen might ratify or declare peace?

On page 108, referring to the authority to purchase the sugar crop at the time the matter was submitted to the President:

Senator NORRIS. As a matter of law, the authority existed at that time to buy that?

Mr. GLASGOW. Yes, sir. But I think we would have been very culpable if we had gone on and exercised the power of the Sugar Board to purchase the Cuban crop of sugar unless we knew Congress desired us to continue the control and distribution for the coming year.

Senator NORRIS. If the President had authorized you, would you have done it?

Mr. GLASGOW. No, sir; not until Congress had given us the powers and they thought it proper. It would come back at last to the discretion of Congress as to whether they desired the distribution of sugar continued.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. You said something that I think ought to be framed in a gold frame, to the effect that you did not feel like acting until Congress had its say.

Mr. GLASGOW. I am not much on these golden frames. I just did not want you gentlemen to put us in the position of buying this crop without an expression as to future policy. I have some respect for what the men I have been associated with have done, and I did not want to be put in the position of making any failure.

That was the position clearly held by the Sugar Equalization Board, clearly announced to the Senate committee, and definitely indorsed by the chairman of the Senate committee, but now under the pressure of political exigency, criticism, and denunciation is hurled forth because the purchase of the Cuban crop was not made without congressional indorsement. This is just an other case of the shifting of position to catch every political wind that blows.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION REQUIRED.

That last testimony is given by the man who is not only a member of the Sugar Equalization Board, but who acted as attorney and legal adviser for the board. He states that the Sugar Equalization Board would not have bought the Cuban crop if the President had authorized its purchase unless Congress had indicated its approval and had granted at least the necessary licensing power as distinguished from the licensing power carried in the food control act, which licensing power terminated with the declaration of peace. Members of the Sugar Equalization Board testified before both the Senate committee and the House committee that they would not have depended for their licensing power upon the licensing power carried in the food control act, which, by its provisions, terminated with the declaration of peace. In this connection it must be borne in mind that on August 8 the President had given to the Congress the opportunity to express its approval of a policy to continue in operation for a definite period not only the war power carried by the food contrbl act, but additional powers to regulate the profits made on other necessities, and the Congress had failed to express legislative consent for the extension to a definite time of these powers of control of sugar and other necessities. The fact that sugar was not mentioned may be used as an argument by those who seek to escape responsibility, but it does not alter the fact that the power to license the sale of that commodity would have been incorporated in the legislation which the President requested if it had been enacted. It is argued by those connected with the Congress who seek to escape responsibility that the information given by the Sugar Equalization Board to the President with regard to the need of purchasing the Cuban crop was not conveyed to the Congress. As a matter of fact that is begging the question. It is a matter of common knowledge that the sugar situation last year was practically the same as the situation was the year before, and that there was the same danger of high prices this year that there was during the two preceding years, and the Congress, though it was a Democratic Congress, under the same condition of necessity, had placed sugar distribution during the last year under the Sugar Equalization Board. Certainly there was no knowledge in the possession of any Member of Congress that the condition had sufficiently changed to justify the belief that there was no need to continue the power with reference to the distribution of sugar during the year 1920. But whatever may be said with regard to the particular period from August 14 to November 3, 1919, there did come a time, and that time well within the possibility of remedial action, when the Congress was fully advised with regard to the sugar situation and the need for legislation under which the Sugar Equalization Board would feel justified in purchasing the Cuban crop.

THE SENATE INVESTIGATION BEGUN.

On the 27th day of September, 1919, Senator NEW, of Indiana, introduced a resolution in the Senate to investigate the sugar situation. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry began its hearing on October 3. On that date Messrs. Zabriskie and Glasgow appeared before the committee. I have already quoted sufficiently from the record of the Senate hearing to show that Messrs. Zabriskie and Glasgow testified clearly and positively that before the Sugar Equalization Board would feel justified in purchasing the Cuban crop it would be necessary for the Congress to enact legislation which would make the Sugar Equalization Board certain that it would possess the power at least to license the distributors of sugar during the year following the purchase of the Cuban crop; that it would not feel justified in purchasing the Cuban crop without Congress's sanction; that it would not purchase the Cuban crop depending upon the licensing power carried in the food control act, which power terminated with the declaration of peace. The reasonableness of that position was not questioned by any member of the Senate Committee. It was not questioned by any member of the House Committee. It cannot be questioned. It was a most reasonable thing for this board to ask to be made certain as to the continuation of the licensing power until the distribution of the sugar purchased was consummated. Congress possessed the power to give and there was no reason why Congress should not give the power other than the nondesire that the Cuban crop be purchased and distributed. And aside from the necessity to have the power, it is reasonable to suppose that the Sugar Equalization Board would not have felt justified in launching upon so important a venture unless the Congress of the United States should give its approval. At that time there was a very powerful influence at work in this country to end the exercise of all such war powers as the Sugar Equalization Board was operating under.

SUGAR EQUALIZATION BOARD PUTS IT UP TO CONGRESS.

When the members of the Sugar Equalization Board appeared before the Senate committee on October 3, they "put it up" to Congress unconditionally and without reference to the President's approval or disapproval that if the Congress would enact the legislation which it deemed necessary and indicate its approval the Sugar Equalization Board would purchase and distribute the Cuban crop. There is not the slightest question about that, and no person who has any regard for the truth will deny that statement. It only remains to be determined whether or not it was too late then to purchase the Cuban crop or whether it would be too late at the consummation of legislation expeditiously enacted. If it was too late, then the Congress has no responsibility other than the responsibility which rests upon it by reason of its failure to grant the legislation requested in the President's message of August 8. If not too late then, but too late at the consummation of the necessary legislation expeditiously enacted, then the Congress would still only share the responsibility incident to its failure to enact the legislation requested by the President in his message of August 8, whatever that may be, whether much, or little, or none. But if not too late to purchase, and the Congress failed to expedite this legislation, being fully advised as to the situation and the necessity of rushing the legislation, and if when the legislation was finally enacted it was too late to purchase the Cuban crop, what person can be so partisan as to say that responsibility does not attach itself to the Congress?

EQUALIZATION BOARD FULLY ADVISES CONGRESS.

In a peculiar way the Congress was responsible at that particular time. The President's illness began on September 26. The president of the Sugar Equalization Board said to the congressional committee on October 3: "Give us your approval, and give us the licensing power, and we will purchase this crop and distribute it to the American public." There were no "ifs" and "ands" about it. It was a clear-cut proposition. Let us see what the testimony before the committees is on this point. I quote from page 61 of the Senate hearing:

Senator MCNARY. In order that we may know and the Senate may know the situation, let me ask whether, if legislation authorizing the purchase of this crop were prepared and passed expeditiously, you extend the hope that you could acquire this crop at a reasonable figure which would prevent the price soaring to the consuming American public?

Mr. ZABRISKIE. I do think so.

Just preceding this statement Mr. Zabriskie testified:

I think the disposition of the Cuban producer is entirely friendly. I think that the banking element would like very much to see something of the sort. As to the price, whether it would be 6½ cents or 7 cents, or whatever, that would be problematic.

This is a sufficient quotation from the record to indicate the situation on October 3, except that the English Royal Commission had not purchased the third of the Cuban crop which Mr. Zabriskie had notified the President on September 23 had been purchased; it had not gotten itself in the proper trading condition to purchase this crop, and at the time of this hearing before the Senate committee this was the situation. I quote from the record of the Senate hearing, page 59:

Mr. ZABRISKIE. Mr. Chairman, there is one point I would like to clear up. When we wrote that letter (the letter of September 23) the Royal Commission was negotiating with Cuba, which would account for the fact that we mentioned such a large proportion as one-third. At that time the Royal Commission was negotiating for some three hundred or four hundred thousand tons. That deal has not been consummated yet.

Senator RANSDELL. So you do not know whether one-third has been contracted for to date?

Mr. ZABRISKIE. No, but at that time we were advised that it had closed. We learned since that Great Britain had purchased the Mauritius crop and was trying to get herself in a better trading position so that she could go after Cuba.

Senator MCNARY. Then do I understand you, as a matter of fact, one-third of the crop has not been purchased?

Mr. ZABRISKIE. I do not think that more than one-fourth of the crop has been purchased.

This one-fourth also included purchases by American refiners. Page 87 of the Senate hearing:

Mr. GLASGOW. One-fourth of the Cuban crop which has been sold includes not only the purchases in Europe of such small sections as may have been made by individual refiners in the United States?

Mr. ZABRISKIE. That will probably be 200,000 tons.

It should be remembered in this connection that of the preceding Cuban crop purchased by the Sugar Equalization Board one-third of that crop, under agreement, was purchased for the English Royal Commission and went to England. So that on the 3d day of October, when the McNary committee got under way, the Cuban refiners had unsold of the current crop a larger part than was the part we took from the preceding year.

Now, let us suppose for the sake of argument that the Congress held no responsibility with regard to sugar prior to October 3, 1919; that it did not have any knowledge of the general sugar situation; that the President had not even read to the Congress his message of August 8, and that if he had read that message to Congress the Congress did not have understanding enough to appreciate what powers the President was asking the Congress to grant; that the Congress did not even know that the licensing power carried by the food control act would expire with the ratification of the treaty of peace; that the Congress did not even know that the treaty of peace was pending in the Senate and was possible of ratification at any time, carrying with its ratification the termination of the licensing power under the Lever or food control act; that the Congress did not even know that sugar, during the preceding year, had been distributed under the Sugar Equalization Board.

But even if all of the Congress could be blanketed in and protected against responsibility by the cloak of ignorance up until the 3d day of October last, the testimony of the president of the Sugar Equalization Board, Mr. Zabriskie, and of Mr. Glasgow, a member of the board and the attorney for the board, destroys the possibility of the further utility of that protection, for on that date the Senate committee and the Congress were advised, first, that a larger percentage of the Cuban crop was then unsold than we had taken from the preceding Cuban crop; second, that it could probably be purchased at a reasonable figure; third, that there was a world shortage of sugar; fourth, that it was necessary to have the licensing power extended to a definite time covering the period of distribution of the crop, if purchased; fifth, that the legislation, in order to be effective, must be expedited. Besides, these gentlemen were there before the committee, tendering themselves to the committee to give to it any information upon the sugar situation which the committee desired.

The committee was fully advised that if the Congress would give to the Sugar Equalization Board its indorsement for the purchase of the Cuban crop and give to it the necessary definite licensing power to distribute the crop, it would proceed to purchase and distribute. That testimony was published and available to all members of Congress.

THE DELAYS OF CONGRESS.

This is how expeditiously Congress proceeded. It was not until November 3, a whole month afterward, that the committee reported a bill to the Senate. The bill did not pass the Senate until December 12. On December 16 it passed the House with amendment. Later the conference report was agreed to, the President signed the bill, and it became effective on the last day of December. This is a copy of the bill which it required from October 3 until December 12 to pass the Senate:

[Public, No. 109, 66th Congress.]

An act to provide for the national welfare by continuing the United States Sugar Equalization Board until December 31, 1920, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized to continue during the year ending December 31, 1920, the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Incorporated), a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, and to vote or use the stock in such corporation held by him for the benefit of the United States, or otherwise exercise his control over the corporation and its directors, in such a manner as to authorize and require them to adopt and carry out until December 31, 1920, plans and methods of securing, if found necessary for the public good, an adequate supply and an equitable distribution of sugar at a fair and reasonable price to the people of the United States. Sections 5 and 10 of the act entitled "An act to further provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, as far as the same relates to raw or refined sugar, syrups, or molasses, are hereby continued in full force and effect until December 31, 1920, notwithstanding the provisions of section 24 of said act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall expire as to the domestic product June 30, 1920: And provided further, That the zone system of sale and distribution of sugars heretofore established by the said United States Sugar Equalization Board shall be abolished and shall not be reestablished or maintained, and that sugars shall be permitted to be sold and to circulate freely in every portion of the United States. The termination of this act shall not affect any act done, or any right or obligation accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said termination, pursuant to this act; but all rights and liabilities under this act arising before its termination shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if the act had not terminated. Any offense committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to such termination may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been terminated.

Approved, December 31, 1919.

This is the bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts referred to when he said before the House committee "and the power to license was extended, as I remember it, until the 1st of April, but the act was practically nugatory because it was not passed until after the entire Cuban sugar crop had passed into the general market and was out of control," except that it was in the House that the bill was amended, giving to the Sugar Equalization Board the licensing power which it requested. Not only was this bill delayed in its passage through the Senate, as is shown by the record to which I have referred, but as it passed there it expressly repealed section 5 of the food control act, which is the licensing section of the food control act. In other words, it expressly denied to the Sugar Equalization Board the very power which the Sugar Equalization Board said it was necessary for it to have before it would feel justified in purchasing the Cuban crop. Thus it made doubly certain the nonpurchase of the Cuban crop, first, by the delay in its passage, and, second, by the failure to give the power which the Sugar Equalization Board told the Senate committee it was necessary for it to have in order to function in the handling of this crop. Of course, when the bill reached the House the middle of December it did not make any difference what amendments were added. The Cuban crop had been sold. The act was dead. The only thing the House amendments could do was to make the corpse look as respectable as possible.

It does not alter the force of these facts because they are stated by one who is a Democrat. They are facts of record. It took from August 8 until almost Christmas to get this legislation through one body of the Congress, if the date when the President's message was delivered be considered. But if the Congress be relieved of all the responsibility prior to October 3, and certainly only the most partisan and biased judgment could so relieve the Congress, it took from October 3, with a Congress in full knowledge of the acuteness of the situation and the necessity to expedite the legislation, until almost Christmas to pass this little bill. Can the Congress be heard to say that it did not have the information? Mr. Zabriskie and Mr. Glasgow gave it to the Senate committee of the Congress.

CONGRESS TOLD IT MUST EXPEDITE LEGISLATION.

Did the Congress know it must expedite the legislation if to be effective? These gentlemen told this committee of the Congress so. These are facts of record. Should a Congress which can pass, through one House, under a special rule, with only 40 minutes' debate, a bill of many pages, vitally affecting many interests and carrying the levy of a tax of not less than a billion and a quarter dollars, be heard to say that it has met its legislative responsibility, that it has demonstrated the interest which it professes in the American consumer, when it requires from October 3 until Christmas to pass a bill of this sort? Would the sugar have been available if the legislation had been expedited? A full month after the president of the Sugar Equalization Board testified before the Senate committee, to wit, on November 3, 1919, Senator McNARY filed a report under that date from which the following quotation is taken:

It is true that a considerable portion of the Cuban crop of 1920 has been acquired by purchase and by contract by domestic refiners and foreign governments. However, it is the belief of the committee that two-thirds of this crop yet remains free of contract and not affected by sale and that it could be acquired at a reasonable figure in view of the world shortage, though perhaps a little higher than the price that would have been exacted in July or August and the price paid for the crop of 1919.

On page 116 of the House hearing Mr. Zabriskie testified that he rather thought he could have bought the Cuban crop as late as November 8 for six and a half cents a pound. This was a month and five days after the whole situation had been laid before the Senate committee.

THE BOARD'S PROPOSITION TO CONGRESS.

Mr. Glasgow, page 129 of the House record:

And the board—I believe Mr. Zabriskie agrees with me—was prepared to carry out the policy that was directed either by the President with the approval of Congress, by legislation, or, if it was directed by Congress, without prior recommendation of the President or suggestion of the President. If it was the President's direction or policy we had to have Congress's action approving it, or we could not do it; if it was Congress's action upon the policy, we did not have to have the President's approval other than the signing of the act which Congress might pass.

I suggest to the judgment of the Congress and of the country if it is not a fact that if a Republican majority of both houses of Congress had displayed one-half the energy and interest in the sugar consumers, when it had the power and the duty to protect them by effective, expeditious legislation, which it is now exerting in trying to deceive the American public as to their responsibility for the present price of sugar, this bill could have been passed within 20 days, certainly within a month, and sugar would be selling now within not more than 2½ cents per pound of the price of last year. Can anybody deny that? While pretending to the American people an interest in procuring for them sugar at a reasonable price and endeavoring to impress the fact of that interest by resolutions, investigations, speeches, and bills introduced, creating a public panic and the wildest sort of scramble for sugar, with its inevitable effect in the direction of enhancement of price, they saw to it that no bill was passed until it was too late to protect the people or to interfere with the private profits which are being included in the present prices demanded for sugar.

INSINCERITY OR LEGISLATIVE INCOMPETENCY.

I do not charge directly that this was willfully done. There are two horns to this dilemma. One is insincerity and the purpose to protect private profits, and the other is legislative incompetency. The facts will not permit an escape of both. The whole field of argument is limited to which horn of the dilemma they may lay hold of. They talk much of sympathy for the American public and opposition to high prices of sugar and fashion a legislative policy which brings benefit to the profit-taker and high prices to the American consumer. I do not charge the purpose, I charge the fact, and I charge the further fact, because it is perfectly apparent, that, in addition to the benefits which have come to the profit taker by this legislative policy, the Republican Congress controlling majority has added much to sugar profits by the campaign of advertisement of sugar shortage, with the competitive scramble for sugar which has resulted from that agitation. But that is not all that is remarkable about the agitating, criticizing Republican majority in control of legislation in both branches of Congress dealing with the sugar situation. This bill which they got through too late for the last crop, this bill which did not arrive in time to help the people to get cheap sugar for this year—again I do not charge the purpose, I charge the fact, a fact of record—this bill dies by its own limitations within this year. It would be worth your while to read carefully this bill, which started in its preliminary stages the first of October and arrived at legislative maturity as a sort of "booby" Christmas gift to the American public. It is the sole legislative and constructive expression of professed concern for cheap sugar for the American public which is to the credit of this Congress, too late to help with present prices, but if the guiding genius of congressional legislation could not send it in time to help with regard to present prices, certainly an American public for whom such deep interest has been expressed, and with regard to whose prices paid for sugar so much denunciation has emanated from the Congress, should expect that this legislation, though ineffective now, carries in its provisions hope for cheaper prices next year. But that is not a fact. That feature has been taken care of also. By the very terms of the bill itself it provides that it shall become inoperative as to domestic sugar, American-grown cane and beet sugar, on the 30th day of this month, while the crops are yet under cultivation out of which the sugar is to be made which the people are to use next year. As to all other sugar it expires within this year. It therefore can not affect next year's distribution.

Politics—that is the explanation for the legislative inefficiency which the record of the Congress reflects. Play along with this matter. Let the profiteers get their profits; that will please them. Let the situation get bad; fasten the responsibility on the Democrats; fool the people with resolutions, speeches, investigations, and denunciations; get political profit and let the public pay the price.

SERVE THE PEOPLE WITH THEIR WORDS.

Great indignation is expressed at the price being charged for sugar—at the "robbery." The necessary legislation to prevent that "robbery" was held up in passage by those who now profess that indignation until too late to protect. It arrived all right, but it stands by inoperative and ineffective while we are being "robbed" this year, and it leaves by the terms of its own limitations too soon to protect us from the "robbers" next year. It is like a policeman who having full knowledge that we are about to be robbed, and plenty of time to reach us before the act begins, cuts down his speed to suit the convenience of the robber and expects us to accept his expressions of sympathy and indignation in lieu of a little more speed in arriving. Of course, we might be overcredulous and overpartisan and somewhat overlook this tardiness in arrival, but how much confidence could the most credulous and most partisan of us have in the sincerity of professed interest if this policeman who arrived too late to protect against the first assault should leave us just as the robber was approaching to rob us again? Read the bill and judge by its own provisions as to the fitness of this analogy.

I have not raised this as a party issue. But the gentlemen of the majority have so busied themselves in trying to capitalize into political advantage the widespread distress and discontent which the sugar situation has aroused that it has seemed to me to be a duty to give to the Congress and to the American public the facts with regard to the responsibility of these critics and agitators and boosters of sugar prices. Whatever may be thought of the fairness of the deductions which I have drawn or of the argument which I have made, the facts which I have stated speak for themselves. They are facts of record, which can not be disposed of by pointing the finger of accusation at some one else. They can not be swept aside by any wind of partisan prejudice which may be put into motion. They are facts which any ordinary person can possess himself of from the public records.

It matters not what may be thought as to the share of responsibility which belongs to the President, the Attorney General, or anyone else, or as to what anyone else should have done or should not have done, no hand of partisan interest, however strong, can lift from those who control this Congress the responsibility for the present price of sugar which the facts fasten upon them.

REFUSE TO FACE RESPONSIBILITY.

If the gentlemen of the majority had been fair enough to face the country upon this proposition, admitting the difficulty of the situation, sharing, as manly men ought to do, the responsibility which belongs to them, together with the responsibility which belongs to others, I would possibly not have felt obligated to make these statements. But when they run from their own responsibility, make such a contribution to a bad situation as the facts show they have made with regard to the sugar situation, and then undertake politically to profit by the results which have flowed from their own neglect, and in their desperation and disregard for the obligations incident to their inquisitorial power attack without warrant the reputation for official integrity of an individual officer—this is carrying the matter farther than is justified even under that most infamous saying, born of the lowest possible conception of civic duty, "All is fair in politics and war."

I hold no warrant to defend the Attorney General. I sustain toward him no personal or personal-political relationship. I owe to him no duty save that duty which is imposed upon every man to every other man to see to it that there is fair play. I sat as a member of the Judiciary Committee which investigated his action with regard to Louisiana sugar, that wrote its solemn condemnation of his action, and filed it three days before the adjournment, as a public document, in the archives of the Congress, thus ending the last act of the subservience of official power to the hope of political profit. I know these are strong words, but they speak out from the record.

THE FACTS RELATIVE TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S ACTION.

Let us see what the facts are with regard to this official act of the Attorney General which has brought down upon his head the partisan judgment of condemnation. His official responsibility and power were fixed and limited by the criminal provisions of the food-control or Lever Act against unreasonable profits. At the time of the action by the Attorney General out of which this investigation has grown these were the salient facts with regard to the Louisiana situation and the undisputed facts:

First. Sugar was selling on the sugar exchange of New Orleans at above 20 cents per pound. The undisputed testimony shows that offers at this price and above were being made from every section of the country for the Louisiana sugar and the market was showing every disposition to "run wild."

Second. From the standpoint of yield the Louisiana producers had experienced one of the worst years in their history, the yield being considerably below half a normal crop and the labor cost had been the highest in their history.

Third. There are approximately 10,000 cane growers in Louisiana and, in round numbers, 160 sugar manufacturers.

Fourth. The food-control act does not apply to farm products; therefore the cane growers could sell their cane at any price they could get.

Fifth. The manufacturers of sugar under the law could pay any price for the cane of the farmers and, under the law, add to it a reasonable manufacturers' profit and sell the sugar at whatever price was necessary to cover cost of cane plus a reasonable manufacturers' profit.

Sixth. At the time of the Attorney General's action these independent growers had existing valid contracts with the manufacturers to sell their cane at the value per ton of 100 pounds of sugar on the open New Orleans market as quoted on the New Orleans sugar exchange. In other words, on the very day the Attorney General acted these growers were entitled to receive for their cane above $20 per ton, and the manufacturers were entitled to sell the output in the neighborhood of 20 cents per pound, depending upon yield, manufacturers' cost, etc. There was not a single law or a single regulation which could prevent this. As the price of sugar went up the price of cane would go up and as the price of cane went up the price of the sugar manufactured from this cane would go up.

Seventh. The only sugar in Louisiana subject to the food-control act was the sugar manufactured from cane produced on the plantations of the 160 sugar manufacturers, and the control over this sugar was limited to that carried by the criminal provisions of the food-control or Lever Act authorizing prosecution for the charging of an unreasonable profit.

Eighth. The Sugar Equalization Board had not received from the Congress sanction to purchase the Cuban crop and the extension of powers requested, and was not proposing to attempt to control the distribution of Louisiana sugar.

Ninth. The situation was daily growing worse, and, as stated, the market was showing every disposition to "run wild."

The probable effect of this condition upon the general market aroused the gravest apprehensions among those interested in holding the price of sugar within reasonable limits. What should have been done, of course, would have been for the Sugar Equalization Board to have bought the Louisiana crop at a fair price, whatever the facts showed that price to be, or to have done that which would have amounted to the same thing, bought the Cuban crop and absorbed out of the profit on the Cuban crop the difference between the purchase price paid for Louisiana sugar and the average selling price of the two crops. That is what it contemplated doing if the Congress had given it the necessary legislation in time. With the hands of the Sugar Equalization Board tied by the nonaction of Congress, the sole power of the Government to influence this situation was under the criminal features of the food-control act against excessive profits. Clearly it was a difficult situation to handle with so limited a power, but the public interest was great. Whatever could be done that would influence the situation as quickly and as generally as possible was demanded by that situation. The thing most essential was to check the upward trend of the general Louisiana market. That was impossible through ordinary legalistic processes under the control of the Attorney General.

The sugar from the cane of the independent growers carrying only the price paid for cane on the basis of the price for which sugar was selling, plus a reasonable manufacturers' profit, the sugar from the plantations of poor yield would be free, without coming in conflict with the criminal features of the food-control act, to accept the highest bid probable of offer. In such a circumstance the application of the criminal law, however vigorously applied, could not affect the general situation nor remove the course of the general danger. It was not the amount of sugar being sold but the prices being received and published to the world which was reflecting itself upon the general market, and especially upon the Cuban sugar, the price of which was not subject, of course, to any law which we could enact or any regulation which we could impose.

Everything was in confusion in Louisiana. Nobody could guess where the market would go to. Nobody knew what effect the confusion and high prices would have on the Cuban crop, except that it was certain to tend the price upward. There was not even a fair-price commission operating in Louisiana to assist in this situation, the chairman having resigned. Without reciting in detail with reference to the informal conferences had by some of the leading growers of Louisiana and the Sugar Equalization Board with the Attorney General, it is sufficient to say that nothing resulted directly therefrom. But there did result a conference in New Orleans between Federal District Attorney Mooney of that district and those representing a large part of the sugar-producing interests of Louisiana. At that conference was done that which has been denounced and investigated and criticized. With regard to what was done Mr. Mooney testified before the House committee that he had gathered all the knowledge he could from every available source of information and had determined that under the conditions existing in Louisiana he could not expect a conviction for sales not above 17 cents for yellow clarified and 18 cents for granulated; that the sugar growers were anxious to know what to do and their attitude held the possibility of bringing the general situation under some sort of control.

After considerable discussion and negotiations those present, though only one person at first would consent, agreed not to sell sugar at prices above the figures 17 and 18 cents, respectively. And Mr. Mooney made them to understand that if they would do this there would be no prosecution, but all sales above 17 and 18 cents would be subject to examination and possible prosecution.

The criticism of the Attorney General is that he pursued this course instead of keeping his conclusions a secret and prosecuting individuals after they had violated the law against excessive profits, and instead of effecting an agreement have permitted the sugar from the cane of the independent growers and from the factory plantations of the poorer yield to run wild on the open competitive market. That is absolutely the fact.

These facts which I have thus far enumerated are not disputed by a single witness nor challenged by a single deduction from any testimony in this remarkable record unwarranted by the authority given the committee and inconsistent with any purpose to discover only the pertinent facts.

If it was the honest conclusion of the district attorney that a conviction could not be had for sales not above 17 cents for prime clarified and 18 cents for plantation granulated sugar, all questions as to prosecution or nonprosecution end there, because there were afterwards no sales above those figures. But let us proceed to probe to the very bottom.

The next inquiry is, Was that conclusion an honest conclusion? But let us not stop there. Was that conclusion, as a matter of fact, a proper conclusion? Not only was it honest—and nobody whose own depravity does not breed general suspicion will charge that it was not—but to what conclusion does the testimony direct with reference to the correctness of the district attorney's judgments? What does the testimony suggest as to the probabilities with reference to convictions for sales not above 17 and 18 cents, respectively?

The crop of Louisiana in 1919, the year under consideration, was 121,000 tons; for the preceding year, 280,900 tons. Twice the 1919 crop would lack over 39,000 tons of equaling the yield of 1918, with a higher labor cost.

The Sugar Equalization Board allowed 9 cents for granulated sugar from the 1918 crop.

Was Mr. Mooney's conclusion correct, that not above 18 cents for a crop of only 40 per cent of the yield of a crop upon which 9 cents per pound had been allowed by the Sugar Equalization Board was probably a fair price? Tested by the same reasonable-profit test which the Sugar Equalization Board had applied the year before, there can be no question about it. It is a simple matter of mathematics, the cost of producing the smaller crop being equally as great as had been the cost of the larger crop.

It is obvious that it would require more than double the 1918 price per pound to give the total net returns and an equal "reasonable profit" which the Sugar Board allowed in 1918, assuming the price of the Sugar Board to have been fair, and there is no contrary assumption permitted by the record. That ought to be clear to all. In fact, under those prices the 1918 prices fixed by the Sugar Board brought $50,562,000, and the crop of 1919 at 18 cents brought $43,560,000.

No one has claimed or will claim that a conviction could have been obtained for selling sugar at 17 and 18 cents, respectively, under a state of facts representing the average profits on an average yield in Louisiana last year.

Nor is that all. The committee conducting this investigation with inquisitorial power and with specific authority granted, upon request of the chairman, to employ auditors to inspect books, etc., does not bring to the knowledge of this House a single case in which the facts would indicate that a conviction probably could have been had. The witnesses which appeared before the committee covered in their operations practically the entire sugar belt and they all testified to the most general conditions of disastrous production. Besides the total yield of only 40 per cent of the 1918 crop shows that fact.

These statements, which nobody will dispute, indicate the general condition when the Attorney General through his district attorney came to deal with the situation. I have not quoted the record to support these statements because the facts stated are not in dispute.

The Attorney General owed at that time two duties, one to the public and one to the citizens who were producing sugar in Louisiana.

How should he proceed? What was the practical, commonsense, honest thing to do? At this point the majority members of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and the minority members of that committee came into conflict of opinion.

There were two ways to proceed and only two, one as Mr. Mooney proceeded and the other as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], with which method the chairman of the committee expressed agreement (p. 56 of the House hearing). I quote from Mr. TINKHAM's testimony, page 36 of the House hearing:

> I think that the only authority that the Attorney General had under the law was to prosecute individual profiteering cases. Now, what result it might lead to makes no difference. He had to act within the authority given him by law. As I stated before, it would be a very difficult thing to indict and convict where there were so many varying conditions and varying factors which would enter into the problem of whether the profit or price was extortionate or not. I will admit that.
> I rather think, however, that what practically would have worked out would have been this, that if the Attorney General had made an examination through his United States attorney and found out what seemed to be a fair price and then had prosecuted and established, as he had a full right to do under the law, what the jury in that particular case thought was a fair price, the trade would have more or less settled to whatever figure that might be. Now, I could not say that would result from one case. In other words, he could take the same course that, as I understand it, was taken under the antitrust law, the Sherman law, where the rule of reason was established by several decisions. Men do not want to contest with the Government; men do not want to pay attorneys' fees unnecessarily, and if they can find out what they should do, the honest one and the fair one usually wants to pursue that course. I know that the average man is honest and fair and wants to keep out of court and out of trouble and avoid trouble and expense.

The majority found themselves forced either to choose this position or to indorse the action of the Attorney General. It was the only position, narrow, ridiculous, and hurtful to the public interest as it would have been, from which the Attorney General could be attacked. The Attorney General is criticized for not treating these Louisiana people as criminals in the first instance, these citizens of this Government confronted with a disastrous year, engaged in a necessary industry. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had been Attorney General, he would have had his district attorney investigate "what seemed to be a fair price." Well, that is what this Attorney General did. And then he would have had his district attorney prosecute, and then he would prosecute some more cases, and then the trade "would more or less have settled to whatever figure that might be." Would not that have been a wonderful procedure? He would have revealed "what seemed to be a fair price" through a prosecution. Why not tell it to the people and save the prosecution? He would have to tell it to the jury in the prosecution. Why force them into conflict with their Government? He says, and says well, they did not want it. He says that "men do not want to pay attorneys' fees unnecessarily if they can find out what they should do." In the name of common sense and common honesty, why not help such a people to a knowledge of what they ought to do? Could the lips of a man under a situation like that in Louisiana have fashioned more foolish words? The gentleman from Massachusetts is a far better man than his statement indicates. The difficulty is that my friend has gotten it into his head that he is a sort of amateur sugar expert and does not appreciate that there is not necessarily any difference between having memorized a lot of figures about a thing and not knowing anything about that thing.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] would have investigated and determined what was a fair price and then he would have locked that knowledge in a secure place in one of the unoccupied vaults of his mind, where it could not be pulled out by accident, and then to the best of his ability he would have branded as criminals and made haters of his Government these men whom he says wanted no contest with the Government. And now listen. I quote again: "Men do not want to pay attorneys' fees unnecessarily, and if they can find out what they should do, the honest ones and the fair ones usually want to pursue that course. I know that the average man is honest and fair and wants to keep out of court and out of trouble and avoid trouble and expense." He was right. Most men are honest and all they want to know is what they should do. But in an extraordinary situation like that in Louisiana last year, when 10,000 honest men wanted to know what was right, wanted to avoid contact with their Government, when the whole situation was up in the air, prices were running wild, much of the sugar was subject to no Government control, he would have limited his activity to the petty policy of trying to send somebody to jail and let the market "run wild." He really would not have done that. If he had been the district attorney and those people had come to him and said, "Tell us what you think about it now and we will try to conform and help you and help the Government," he would have told them, because to have closed his lips against the revelation of his conclusion, which they only wanted to know in order that they could conform thereto, and instead to have laid in wait for them and prosecuted such a people in the first instance, would have been a dastardly act and a foolish act on the part of any Government dependent for its perpetuity upon the affection of its people and their belief in its justice. For not having done that, however, the Attorney General is denounced, investigated, and criticized. This but illustrates what situations men may plunge themselves into when partisan prejudice guides their footsteps. That is not a charge. That is the kindest thing which may be said. For no man who claims the privilege of walking free among his fellows and feels in his heart that he is worthy of that privilege, if he were the chief prosecuting officer of this great Government would do what these gentlemen say ought to have been done. No real man, sobered by the sense of responsibility which the consiousness of the power which that great office carries, could think of doing such a thing. These gentlemen do themselves an injustice. This was not an ordinary situation. The criminal provisions of the food-control act are not fashioned as are the ordinary criminal laws. Agriculture is not like the ordinary business.

The district attorney investigated just as the gentleman from Massachusetts advised he would have done. He determined the fair price, and then he did the only fair thing, the only honest thing that the representative of the government of a free people could do. He announced his determination, and in the same spirit in which he met these producers they rewarded his approach and rewarded the public by bringing Louisiana sugar down from 20½ cents to 17 cents and 18 cents. And they brought under the control of a general agreement the sugar from nearly 10,000 independent farmers, over the basis of the price of which neither the food-control act nor any other law ever had any control whatever. Toward which plan would a proper exercise of the discretion of the prosecuting officer incline his selection? Which policy do we want reflected upon the private citizenship from the office of the Attorney General, behind whom is all the power of a mighty Government? No wonder this committee went far afield in its search! No wonder it has sought to distract public attention from the only legitimate subject of its inquiry!

Not only did the Attorney General do what I have stated, but in addition thereto he brought under the control of this agreement the sugar from a large majority of the plantations which operate their own factories. These planters, such as Milling, Pharr, Dickinson, and Chaffe, and others who testified before the committee, either lost money at the agreed price or fell far below a reasonable per cent on their investments. The public did not suffer by the Attorney General's action.

These were the people who suffered and they suffered in the public interest. It was not their fault that the excessive rains had all but ruined their crops. They met their Government's request in the spirit of sacrifice for the public good, because their Government approached them as honest men should be approached, in a spirit of open candor, with an appeal to their public spirit, and not in the Tinkham-Husted way, as though they were criminals.

Abandoning for the time the position that the Attorney General's action had worked to the public hurt, these critics of the Attorney General say this was a hardship upon these men. And so it was. It had been a hardship to give their sons for the public defense. Those were times when the public interest was dominant. Individuals, some legislative bodies, and administrative officers were stretching to the limit their respective powers to promote and protect the public interest. These sugar men, through the firm, tactful, man-to-man method of approach of the Attorney General acting through the district attorney, were brought to meet the challenge of that time, and agreed to sell sugar at a price to which neither the market nor any power exercisable by the Government could have forced them. Nobody will dispute that. These men are not complaining. Why should the gentlemen of the majority weep on their shoulders?

But, say these irreconcilable critics, there must have been some one in Louisiana whom the Attorney General could have convicted for profiteering at sale prices of 17 and 18 cents. Somewhere there must have been a favored spot where the clouds did not pour their floods upon the fields. We have no disposition to shirk at any point of difference between the majority and the minority members of this subcommittee. I do not doubt there were such spots. The crop reports indicate that. Suppose there could have been found a planter, this particular season, who was making even 40 per cent profit on his sugar at 17 and 18 cents, though there was no testimony to that effect. I do not propose to beg the question; for the sake of discussion let us admit it. Is there a man who has had any experience as a prosecuting officer, who knows anything about the hazards of farming, and who has any real sense, who would conclude that he could convict a sugar producer under the Lever Act for selling at 18 cents when the general market was from 2½ to 3½ cents above, even though he was making a profit of 40 per cent, and solely upon the proof that in that year he was making that profit? I suppose these gentlemen think they could. This is their last ditch. Let us see whether they could or not. The sugar farmer each year gambles the use of his equipment and cultivation cost that his seed cane will not rot in the field, that there will be enough rain, that there will not be too much rain, that the freeze will not come too early, and so forth. One year he loses money, the next year he may break even, and the next year either of these may happen, or he may make a good crop and get a good price. If there is too much rain, the "hill" man wins and the "bottom" man loses. If there is too little rain, the "bottom" man is better conditioned than the "hill" man. The opportunity to secure the average price through the lean and the good years balances up the profits and losses and is the only thing which makes agriculture possible.

Would it be a just or a wise public policy, if possible to enforce, to compel a given farmer to take his losses when they come and take from him the profits which balance against those losses? Do the distinguished gentlemen who constituted the majority on this subcommittee believe that, or that a jury of men could be assembled to whom such a belief could be transferred? I would like to see the Attorney General of the United States, or even the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, or the distinguished chairman convict a farmer for selling his crops at a figure not above the average price received for the commodity by others merely because in that year fortune had sought to repay his losses and give to him hope for the next year's effort. Only the man who thinks in the terms of a manufacturing plant, which with a given amount of equipment, labor, and material can calculate with reasonable certainty as to output and can protect itself either by prior sales or current sales with regard to price and profit, would undertake such a prosecution; only the man whose vision of mentality has been shortened by the limited range of a city's streets would criticize a man like District Attorney Mooney, who has some real sense, for concluding, as he testified, that in his judgment he could not convict for sales not above 17 and 18 cents. Of course he could not have done it. He handled this difficult situation in the only practical way. He approached these men as honest men ought to have been approached, and as a result he stopped the upward trend and pulled down the price of Louisiana sugar from 20½ cents to 17 cents. That is the fact. He saved the Government the expense of futile prosecutions, and bound down that price by an agreement which no man violated. He is the one and only man that I know of who has it to his credit that he did last year something which did reduce the price of sugar somewhere.

The real purpose of this investigation was disclosed by the opening statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] in his enumeration of the questions involved in the investigation (p. 4 of the House hearing): "Fourth, what effect his (the Attorney General's) action had, if any, upon the price of sugar, particularly in Cuba."

Upon this point four witnesses testified, among them the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. He did not claim to be a sugar expert, though he did appear before the committee as a sort of self-confessed amateur sugar expert, more or less of the correspondence-school type. He said that the action of the Attorney General in the matter might have added $74,097,560 to sugar prices, and then he proceeded to multiply these figures by two and said it might have been $148,192,120 (p. 77, House hearing). Mr. Zabriskie testified that the effect of sugar selling in Louisiana at 21 cents per pound and going up, in his opinion, was greater than the effect of the fact that the Attorney General would not prosecute for sales not above 17 and 18 cents, respectively (p. 122, House hearing). Mr. Hoover testified that he did not know which would have the greater effect (p. 294, House hearing). Mr. Glasgow testified that it was the fact that sugar was selling as high as 21 cents in the New Orleans market, and not the action of the Attorney General, which excited the Cuban market (p. 130, House hearing).

I respectfully submit that common sense testifies that an open market of 21 cents, showing tendencies to "run wild," reflecting a scramble for sugar and the willingness to pay the price necessary to get it, would have a greater effect upon anybody who has sugar to sell than the action of the Attorney General which pulled the market down to 17 and 18 cents, and by the exercise of the proper spirit and tact fastened above those figures an agreement which never permitted prices to go above those figures, though there was under the market the pressure of the strongest sort of demand at practically any price. Ordinary common sense can pass on that as well as can any expert who ever lived or ever will live on this earth. But the majority members brought the experts, and the experts would not testify that the action of the Attorney General put up the price of Cuban sugar. And yet in the face of that testimony and in the face of common sense the majority members of this subcommittee in their report to the House solemnly stated it as a fact that the action of the Attorney General in this matter "caused an advance in the Cuban market." That sort of proceedings is not right. It can not be excused by any sort of political exigency.

I do not care what may be thought of my own political bias, or what my party would have done if the situation had been reversed. This country belongs to the people. Regardless of political parties there are certain fundamental principles of justice for which we must all stand. Whether I challenge this sort of procedure because of my party affiliations or because I do not believe it to be right makes no difference; I do challenge it and I stand ready to defend the challenge. Whether it be my party or some other party which attempts to do and does do that which the Republican Party has attempted to do and has done with regard to this sugar matter, it is the duty of somebody to challenge that attempt and those acts.

In order that there may be no uncertainty, I make the following definite affirmations and respectfully challenge any Republican Member of this Congress to deny them:

First. That on August 10, 1917, under a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President, the food control or Lever Act, as it is sometimes called, was passed, and under the provisions of this act the Sugar Equalization Board was created, the Cuban sugar crop was purchased, and the distribution of this crop and of the domestic crop was controlled, and general prices held within the neighborhood of 10 and 11 cents.

Second. That the food control act being a war measure and terminating with the declaration of peace, the President on August 8, 1919, in a message delivered in person to a joint session of both Houses of Congress, specifically asked the Congress to extend to a time definite the provisions of the food control act.

Third. The Congress refused to comply with this request and failed to extend the operation of the food control act, and left the power to control the distribution of sugar subject to the uncertainty of termination incident to the proclamation of peace.

Fourth. On the 3d day of October, 1919, the president of the Sugar Equalization Board, Mr. Zabriskie, and Mr. Glasgow, a member of that board and its attorney, appeared before a subcommittee of the Senate investigating as to sugar and known as the McNary committee and advised that committee:

(a) That at that time at least three-fourths of the Cuban crop, which was one-sixth more than the amount of our share of the preceding Cuban crop taken in the division of that crop between ourselves and the commission purchasing sugar for Great Britain, was unsold and available for purchase at a price in the neighborhood of 6½ to 7 cents per pound.

(b) That the Sugar Equalization Board would proceed to purchase this sugar if the Congress would give its indorsement to the venture, and extend to a time definite, sufficient to cover the distribution of the crop purchased, a power to control its distribution similar to the power carried in the food control act.

(c) It was specifically pointed out and emphasized that the Sugar Equalization Board would not undertake this purchase in the absence of the indorsement of the venture by Congress or in the face of the possibility of having its power to control distribution cut off at any time by the proclamation of peace.

(d) It was impressed in the strongest possible manner that in order for anything to be done beneficial to the American people legislation indicating the desire of Congress to have the Cuban crop purchased and granting the power to control its distribution must be expedited.

(e) No member of the committee questioned the reasonableness of the legislation asked, or even intimated that the Sugar Equalization Board should proceed without further legislation, but on the contrary the chairman of the full committee complimented the board for having come to Congress for its legislative approval before proceeding to purchase the crop.

Fifth. That with full knowledge of the whole situation thus given and full responsibility the bill known as the McNary bill, which is the only legislation upon the subject, did not pass the Senate until the 12th day of the following December. It passed the House on the 16th day of December with amendments and became a law after the December recess and after the Cuban crop had, of course, been sold.

Sixth. The entire legislative record of this Congress, which has been in practically continuous session for a year and throughout which time there has been a constant agitation of the sugar question, and advertisement of sugar shortage, and a stimulation of competitive scramble for sugar, with the inevitable enhancement of price, is that it passed a bill expressing congressional assent to purchase the Cuban crop after it had already been sold and was beyond the reach of purchase, and which by the limitations carried in the bill itself told the Sugar Equalization Board and all the other administrative and controlling agencies of the Government that Congress does not indorse the proposition to purchase or control the distribution to the American people of sugar produced during this year. That is the record of this Congress made with full information, complete power, and full responsibility. This bill is the last and only act of Congress touching the purchase and control of sugar prices to the American people, and is the clear expression of its will and judgment that all control over domestic sugar end on June 30, 1920, and over all other sugar on December 31.

Seventh. This Congress adjourns with the record against it, (a) that it refused to give the Sugar Equalization Board legislative sanction to purchase the last Cuban crop and the power to control its distribution until after the crop had already been sold; (b) that it affirmatively denies to the Sugar Equalization Board its sanction to purchase or to have anything to do with the sugar in process of production and which is to supply the needs of the people this winter and next year; (c) that its whole legislative policy and its policy of agitation has been directly to the benefit of those who are interested in charging the American people high prices for sugar.

Eighth. The failure to pass the McNary bill, or some other bill of like import, until the Cuban crop had been sold prevented the purchase of the Cuban crop, put the Sugar Equalization Board out of control over sugar prices, subjected the people to the prices now being paid for sugar, and by the express limitations carried in the bill, limiting to this year the powers and sanction to purchase carried in the bill, cut off the American people from any hope of getting cheaper sugar next year through any purchasing and administrating agency similar to that which the Sugar Equalization Board constitutes.

These statements are made with a full appreciation of the responsibility incident to their making. I do not desire to place myself in the attitude of issuing any challenge with regard to them, but if any of the gentlemen who have manifested so much interest in this matter feel that they would like to take issue with me in their discussion before the people of the country. I see no reason why it may not be arranged to accommodate that desire.

OF

HON. JAMES G. STRONG,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me by the House, I desire to place in the RECORD a statement of a part of the work performed at the end of the second session by the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Those who for "political purposes" or because some "pet hobby" was not enacted into law engage in the pastime of "knocking Congress" usually propound the question, "What has Congress done?" trusting to a general lack of knowledge as to what Congress has done to enable them to supply their own negative answer. I feel, therefore, that the facts should be presented, as they are the greatest condemnation of those who, perhaps unconsciously, defame that branch of our great Nation directly chosen from and by the people, which is the foundation and basis of the best Government that has ever existed among men.

The real work of Congress is performed by its great committees and not on the floor of the House, as is generally supposed. To these committees are not only referred the thousands of bills which are introduced by the Members but they must also prepare, consider, and approve the great measures that are reported to Congress for passage, which provide for the organization, management, and control of every activity of this great Nation, now grown to be the greatest and richest on earth, and it should be remembered that its business is the largest and most complicated in the world; no other public or private corporation approaches it in the volume, detail, or variety of its business affairs. Positions on these committees are determined by length of service, the new Members beginning at the foot of the committee and become ranking members and chairmen only after years of hard work, during which they become experts on the subject studied. Hence districts and States that retain their Representatives and Senators secure the greatest influence on the legislation of the Nation. Here it is that business and professional experience count most and the lack of them act as a handicap.

The present Republican Congress, which under the Constitution would not have met before December 1, 1919, was called together in special session because of the failure of the Democratic Congress to pass the great appropriation bills necessary to provide the funds for the operation of the Government departments for the ensuing year before its adjournment on March 4. It was not intended that we should have time to do anything more than pass those bills just as they had been prepared by the Democratic House, as the administration requested, and so nearly three months were allowed to pass before we were called together, on May 19, to pass the bills that had to be effective by July 1. However, all the newly-elected Members of Congress had come to Washington at their own expense in February, 1919, the Republican organization was perfected, committee assignments made, and the study of the great supply bills—the work to be done and the condition of the country—was started, so that when we met in May we knew that the wasteful and incompetent expenditure of the funds provided by the people for conducting the war had left an interest-bearing indebtedness of twenty-six thousand million dollars, an empty Treasury, and outstanding debts of three thousand million dollars in excess of the income for the ensuing year; so we were ready for the careful consideration of the needs of the Government with a realization of the necessity for the greatest economy. The members of the important committees worked day and night those first few weeks, and, to the surprise of the administration and the Democratic minority, the eight appropriation bills were reported and passed on time and with a saving to the people of $940,610,598.97 less than the same bills carried when reported and passed by the Democratic House but three months before.

The general knowledge of the graft of the cost-plus contractors, the aeroplane scandal, the granting and settlement of war contracts forced the appointment of a committee to investigate war expenditures. This committee was composed of both Republicans and Democrats, and their report reveals facts as to the disgraceful waste of public funds which are almost unbelievable. It is possible to refer to only a few of the items set forth by the report of this committee, but it shows

WHAT WE GOT FOR OUR MONEY.

We expended $1,051,511,988 for aviation and aeroplanes, and up to the time of the signing of the armistice not a single fighting plane was at the American front. As a result of our entire aviation program we obtained 213 De Haviland 4 observation planes, all of which were illy designed and constructed and extremely dangerous, and 527 second-hand foreign planes, which we either bought or borrowed from our associates in the war.

We expended $50,000,000 on a spruce-production program, building elaborate railroads, camps, and facilities, and then were forced to buy 92.6 per cent of our spruce lumber from private, independent spruce lumbermen. We spent approximately $10,000,000 on spruce railroads that never hauled a log of lumber.

We spent $20,000,000 for 4,608 Curtiss motors, 1,616 Curtiss type aeroplanes, and 1,100 Standard JN-1 aeroplanes, which we purchased from the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation and then sold back to them for $2,720,000.

We spent $6,000,000 for Bristol planes and $17,500,000 on Standard JN planes and got not a single machine that could be used for any purpose.

We spent $206,632,920 for 16 National Army cantonments, built by the cost-plus system. These could have been built for $128,101,399, or $78,531,521 less than they did cost. We expended $1,200,000,000 for the construction of camps and cantonments, largely by the cost-plus system, a system adopted by the War Department. By this system costs were increased, labor demoralized, the completion of the camps was delayed, soldiers called to the colors were subjected to conditions that induced disease and death, and from 40 to 60 per cent of the money was wasted. Twenty-two million dollars was spent for fees to favored contractors on camps and cantonments, most of which would have been saved had this work been let by bids.

We spent $60,100,000 to build a powder plant at Nitro, W. Va. It never produced a pound of powder for the war. After the armistice there was stored at Nitro personal property worth at a fair cash value of $10,000,000. Both plant and property were sold after the armistice for $8,551,000, most of it in deferred payments. We paid the Hercules Powder Co. for operating the Nitro plant $11,293,737.11. They produced no powder that we could use in the war.

We spent $2,900,000 in furnishing electrical machinery and building electric lines for the Virginia Power Co. at Nitro, W. Va., and after we had built them a first-class system, giving them a practical monopoly of the Kanawha Valley, the Government settled with them for $81,000, and, in addition, gave them a long-time contract to furnish electric power for the naval armor plant at Charleston, W. Va.

We spent approximately $90,000,000 in the construction and operation of a powder plant at Nashville, Tenn., called "Old Hickory," and which produced no powder that could be used in the war.

We spent many millions, the exact amount being unknown, for the production of tanks and did not produce a single tank that reached the front before the armistice. To complete our tank program we needed 1,200 tanks, which were to cost $25,000 each. To build these we started an immense steel and concrete factory in France, which was to assemble and turn out 100 of these tanks a day, or the entire supply in 12 days. The British were to furnish the guns and armor and ship them to France for assembly, while we were to furnish the engines and running gear and ship them to France for assembly. The British supplied their part, but we supplied nothing. The factory was unfinished at the armistice and never produced anything.

We spent $116,194,974.37 on nitrate plants at Sheffield, Ala.; Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Toledo, Ohio; and Cincinnati, Ohio. These plants did not produce a pound of nitrates that could be used in the war.

We spent for poison gas $116,000,000. Not a pound of American gas was ever fired in an American shell, and only about 100 tons of American gas loaded in shells ever reached the field dumps.

The Government built three picric-acid plants and seven plants to make phenol and acid required by them. This was to furnish picric acid for the French, who desired it for explosives. None of these plants produced a pound of anything that was used in the war. The plants cost us $35,000,000. The French were to pay the whole bill, but the War Department settled with France for $14,000,000.

We spent $17,116,000 in constructing a port terminal at Charleston, S. C. It was built in an isolated swamp, 10 miles up the Cooper River, where it was necessary to dredge to reach it. There was not a man, a pound of produce, or an animal shipped either out of or into this terminal during the war.

We spent $127,661,000 for port terminals at Boston, Brooklyn, Newark, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Charleston, and New Orleans. Some of them were not finished and none of them were used for anything except storage during the war.

The Ordnance Department spent $3,991,489,570.48 from the beginning of the war until June 1, 1919, or as much as it cost to finance the Civil War. A large part of it was spent in a program of manufacturing artillery and ammunition. Of this immense program of expenditures there reached our troops and were actually used in combat 39 75-millimeter antiaircraft mount trucks, 48 4.7-inch guns of the 1906 model, 48 4.7-inch gun carriages of the same model, 24 8-inch howitzers, and 24 8-inch gun carriages. We furnished our troops for use 6,000 75-millimeter shells, 14,000 4.7 shells, 48 4.7 guns, and 24 8-inch howitzers.

These are the principal things the soldiers need to fight with—aeroplanes, gas, tanks, guns, and shells—and it is hard to understand how so much money could be spent and such small results secured. But the failure was not alone in the essential things, and it is amazing to know of the excessive orders given for the less essential things. A few instances will indicate this:

We ordered 41,100,152 pairs of shoes and received deliveries of 32,227,450 pairs for 3,513,837 men. We bought and received 500,326 double sets of harness and 110,828 single sets. We had, in all, during the period of the war 580,182 horses, of which only 67,948 were shipped overseas, and 96,000 died. We bought 945,000 saddles, and had, in all, 86,418 Cavalry horses. We bought 2,850,853 halters. We bought 585,615 saddlebags. We bought 1,637,199 horse brushes. We bought 2,033,204 nose bags. We bought 1,148,364 horse covers. We bought for our Ordnance officers 712,510 complete sets of spur straps, about 36 sets for each officer. We bought 8,781,516 horseshoes. We bought 195,000 branding irons. We ordered 149,456,611 hard-bread cans and used 31,500,000 during the war.

Nothing can be said in defense of this program of enriching the war contractors. It is astounding, but it is true.

FORCED SALE OF FOOD SUPPLIES.

When the war closed we had on hand and had contracted for food and clothing, which was delivered, sufficient for an army of 5,000,000 for eight months in advance. Every effort was made to bring about the sale of this material, as the Government needed the money and the people needed the food. Yet for six months there was no surplus declared on which the Director of Sales could act. The House reported and passed resolution 212, requesting the Secretary of War to sell to the people the surplus food held by it and valued at approximately $100,000,000. It was found the War Department had entered into a tentative agreement with the packers and canners not to put this food on the market, and were using every method to dispose of it by feeding it to soldiers or otherwise, so that it should not be sold to the people. As a result of this resolution, $57,000,000 of this food has been sold and that much money has gone to the Treasury that would otherwise not have been there.

The House also passed resolution No. 362, requesting the Secretary of War to distribute through the Agricultural Department, among the highway departments of the States, 22,193 motor vehicles and to sell the balance. As the result of this resolution, machines to the value of $67,341,479 have been distributed among the States, and $2,800,000 has been paid into the Treasury for machines sold.

Mr. Hare, Director of Sales of the War Department, when before the committee was asked to state the policy of the War Department in disposing of its surplus foodstuffs, and in reply he said:

> It was the policy of the Director of Sales to dispose of surplus property of the War Department so as to disturb the industrial conditions of the country as little as possible.

In other words, though the people were complaining because of the high prices of foodstuffs, the administration did not want to "break the market," and the evidence disclosed that great stores of meat and foodstuffs were permitted to spoil and were destroyed.

WAR PROFITEERS NOT PROSECUTED.

The report of the investigating committee on war expenditures is filled with instances of graft and wrongdoing, in which the names of those found guilty or wrongfully taking unjust profits are set forth, but no prosecutions have resulted. Why? Ask the administration. You will remember that ex-Justice Hughes recommended a court-martial for Col. Edward A. Deeds because of his connection with the letting of $50,000,000 worth of contracts to his friends for building aeroplanes, but Secretary Baker interfered. Deeds was whitewashed and retired and was given a great banquet at Washington and was acclaimed one of the heroes of the war. Attorney General Palmer does not prosecute the high-ups. He asked Congress to include clothing and other articles under the statute making it unlawful to profiteer in food products to enable him to reduce the high cost of living, and we promptly did this, but except for his promises we have had nothing else from him. Congress can pass laws to govern and regulate those matters conferred to it by the Constitution and not reserved to the States, but it can not enforce them. That is the duty of the Executive. Congress can make investigation and expose wrongdoing, graft, crime, and profiteering, as it has done, but it can not prosecute. That is the duty of the Department of Justice under the direction of the Executive.

HE KEPT US OUT OF PEACE.

The Senate, after two earnest attempts to present reservations to a premeditatively interwoven peace treaty and League of Nations, which would preserve our national independence and leave us free to decide on any future interference in European affairs, had to abandon the effort, only to find that a resolution passed by both the House and Senate to officially declare peace and take from the President his war powers met opposition and was promptly vetoed.

BILLS PASSED BY CONGRESS.

This Congress, in addition to the great saving made in the appropriation bills which had failed in the Democratic Congress, and in addition to exposing the graft and wasteful expenditure of the war funds, also began a great program of reconstruction, all of which was carried out as far as possible against the opposition of an administration of which—let us say in charity—its head may be both physically and mentally affected.

It passed a bill providing for the return of the railroads to their owners, after months of consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, during which every plan was discussed and 3,669 pages of evidence taken and after weeks of consideration by the conferees of both Houses. This will prove to be a great piece of constructive legislation.

It repealed the so-called daylight-saving law and passed the same over the veto of the President.

It passed the Volstead Act for the enforcement of national prohibition, which was ratified by the States, and also passed the same over the President's veto.

It passed the law returning the telephone and telegraph lines to their owners.

It passed the water-power bill, which is intended to utilize the power of nature to increase production. This bill had been pending for years before Congress.

It passed the coal, oil, and gas leasing bill.

It passed a budget bill, which had been advocated by financial and business experts for years, only to have it vetoed by the President because it sought to take the heads of the system out of politics by making their removal subject to Congress instead of at the pleasure of the President, and when it was amended to comply with the President's command it was defeated by Democrats in the Senate.

It passed the Army reorganization bill, rejecting the demand for a large army and universal compulsory training insisted upon by the administration.

It passed a uniform cold-storage bill.

It liberalized the Federal reserve act and the Federal farm-loan act in the interest of the farmer.

It passed a coastwise shipping protection bill and a bill to establish an American merchant marine.

It passed a bill for the incorporation of the American Legion.

It enacted liberal provisions for vocational training and rehabilitation for our wounded soldiers and sailors and made generous appropriations for the same.

It amended the war-risk insurance act to increase the efficiency of the bureau and liberalize the provisions in the payment of compensation to disabled men who served in the war.

It passed a bill providing for the return of the bodies of our dead heroes from France.

It passed the Fuller bill, providing for the increase of Civil War pensions.

It passed the Sells bill, providing for increased pensions for Spanish War veterans.

It passed the employees' retirement bill, which has been before Congress for many years.

It passed the minimum-wage labor law.

It created a woman's department in the Bureau of Labor.

It raised the wages of all Government employees, including the immense Postal Service System.

It passed the Fess bill, providing for Federal aid and cooperation with the States in the vocational training and rehabilitation of those injured in industry, agriculture, and transportation.

It passed the bill for the completion of the Alaskan Railway, necessary to the development of that great, rich Territory, and many other bills of minor importance.

A SAVING, PORKLESS CONGRESS.

And finally it passed all of the great appropriation bills necessary for carrying on the Government's departments for the next year, and by the exercise of the same careful economy practiced in passing the appropriation bills, which failed in the Democratic Congress, a further saving from the estimates and demands of administration heads to the amount of $1,433,850,218.09 was made, making a total saving to the people in the two sets of appropriation bills, which this Congress was called on to pass, of $2,374,460,817.06.

Much more could have been saved if we had the power to force the discharge of the thousands of useless employees that crowd the Government's departments, but that can only be accomplished by a change in the administration.

This has been a "porkless Congress." No new public buildings have been authorized and no new river and harbor projects have been undertaken. Every measure to make expenditures sometimes referred to as "pork-barrel appropriations" has been rejected.

A SERVING CONGRESS.

It has been a Congress in which the aftermath of the war has brought to every Member thousands of cases for adjustment, through the departments, and which has taxed our ability and experience, to perform and to keep up the large correspondence which necessarily came to every Representative, but it has been a pleasure to serve.

Take it all in all, the Republicans of the country are to be congratulated on the record of achievement made by this Congress in the face of an opposing and domineering Executive, whose position on important matters of state no one could foresee or rely upon, and I believe the people will view with approval the work it has accomplished.

The Maintenance and Improvement of Rivers and Harbors—The Importance of Developing Water Transportation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. SMALL,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained to comment upon the dereliction of the Republican majority at this session in their attitude toward the annual river and harbor bill.

As a result of the last election in 1918, the Republican Party elected a majority in both the House and Senate, and thereby assumed the responsibility for legislation during this—the Sixty-sixth—Congress. This was the second or regular session of this Congress, during which it was incumbent upon the majority to pass the regular annual river and harbor bill. As is well known, the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, submits an annual report giving the status of every river, canal, or harbor under improvement or maintenance throughout the country, and submits estimates as to the necessary appropriations for the ensuing fiscal year. In his last annual report the Chief of Engineers submitted estimates and recommended appropriations as follows:

Total of estimates for work of maintenance	$9,060,350
Total of estimates for works of improvement and maintenance	3,452,000
Total estimate for works of improvement	30,029,215
Estimate for examinations, surveys, and contingencies of rivers and harbors	300,000
Total of estimates for works of all kinds to be carried in the river and harbor bill for the year ending June 30, 1921	42,841,565

It will be noted that the Chief of Engineers recommended total appropriations of $42,841,865. When the Committee on Rivers and Harbors met in December, 1919, at the beginning of the session, to formulate a river and harbor bill they were advised by the majority leader that the committee should exercise rigid economy and that the estimates submitted by the Chief of Engineers should be reduced. This course met with the unanimous approval of the committee, and the Chief of Engineers was directed to reexamine carefully the status of all the rivers and harbors of the country, with a view to reducing the estimates to the lowest limit compatible with the maintenance of projects already completed and with the further improvement of projects heretofore authorized but not completed. He was directed to limit the appropriations for further improvement to such sums only as were necessary to continue the work and prevent deterioration.

It will be noted from the above summary that the original estimates for maintenance amounted to $9,060,350. This did not include the estimates for maintenance so mingled with work of improvement that they could not be separated. In the interest of economy the committee decided primarily to include in the bill a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 to cover the cost of maintenance, to be allotted by the Chief of Engineers. The committee were not unanimous in recommending the lump sum even for maintenance, but because such action promised to work economy a majority of the committee yielded on this proposition.

As to appropriations for the further improvement of projects not completed, the Chief of Engineers, through his assistant, Col. Harry Taylor, appeared before the committee and recommended reduced appropriations for 49 projects, carrying a total of about $19,500,000. These recommendations represented, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, the irreducible minimum which should be appropriated for further improvement of these particular projects. After hearings before the committee, continuing for many days, in which these recommendations of the Chief of Engineers were carefully pruned and considered, but before the committee had taken final action on same, the chairman of the committee stated that the majority party had recommended that the committee report a bill carrying a lump-sum appropriation of $12,000,000 to cover both maintenance and further improvement for the ensuing year. Such a bill was reported and passed the House on January 22, 1920, and passed the Senate on April 26, 1920, with an amendment increasing this lump-sum appropriation to $24,000,000. The bill was considered by the conference committee of the two Houses, whereupon the Senate conferees finally yielded and the bill became a law on June 5, 1920, carrying only this lump-sum appropriation of $12,000,000.

It will be noted that the lump sum of $5,000,000 for maintenance and the reduced recommendation by the Chief of Engineers for further improvement, totaling $19,500,000, would have made an aggregate of only $24,500,000. If to this should be added the sum of $400,000, as recommended, for examinations, surveys, and contingencies, the total amount would have been a little less than $25,000,000. It must be apparent that this last sum represented a total which, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, was absolutely essential for the maintenance and further improvement of navigable channels and harbors throughout the country.

I may add further that the committee had concluded not to recommend in the bill the adoption of any new projects. This conclusion was reluctantly reached in the interests of economy.

I respectfully submit that the maintenance and improvement of our interior waterways and harbors is relatively just as important as any other activity of the Government. I also think it is fair to state that the majority, in making appropriations for the other departments and governmental activities for the next fiscal year, did not adopt any such policy as they did toward rivers and harbors. A lump-sum appropriation to be divided among the various activities of any bureau or department constitutes a vicious method of legislation. It is a surrender of the legislative function and unfair to the country. No explanation was given why the sum of $12,000,000 was selected. It might have been more or less without violating any principle or policy, because it was founded on neither. In making allotments of this lump-sum appropriation the Chief of Engineers can not allocate the sum among the several rivers and harbors of the country in proportion to their needs, because the aggregate sum was not arrived at upon the basis of necessity, but represents a mere arbitrary guess and is merely speculative. Such allocation must likewise be arbitrary, and the Chief of Engineers, though he will act with fairness and integrity, will find it impossible to make his allotments fairly or systematically. Is it unfair to state that the majority willfully discriminated against this essential activity of the Government represented by the maintenance and improvement of the rivers and harbors? There seems to be only one conclusion.

It would be profitable to examine into the record of the Democratic Party in their treatment of appropriations for the maintenance of rivers and harbors. The Democrats were in the majority in the House of Representatives in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses, having first elected a majority of the House in 1910. The first river and harbor bill passed by the Democratic majority was that approved July 25, 1912, which carried cash appropriations amounting to $31,059,370. The last bill passed by a Democratic majority was the bill approved March 2, 1919. I submit herewith a table summarizing the contents of each of the bills from 1912 to 1919, inclusive:

Table showing some details of annual river and harbor acts from 1912 to 1919, inclusive.

It is interesting to note that the river and harbor acts approved August 8, 1917, and July 18, 1918, were passed when our country was engaged in the Great World War. If at any time Congress would neglect its rivers and harbors, it can be assumed that it would do so during the progress of a great war. It is pleasant to note that any temptation to do so was rejected and that the annual continuity of these bills was maintained. In the river and harbor act of 1917 more than $27,000,000 was appropriated, and in the act of July 18, 1919, more than $23,000,000 was appropriated. It is true that in these acts due economy was exercised and no new projects were adopted except such as were necessarily associated with the prosecution of the war; but the fact remains that river and harbor acts were passed in 1917 and 1918 and that specific appropriations were made for the various projects in accordance with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers and that no lump-sum appropriations were adopted.

I repeat again that in the river and harbor bill at this session, while due economy should have been exercised, the interests of the country demanded a river and harbor act in the usual form, making specific appropriations for the maintenance and improvement of the various projects.

Will it be suggested that the maintenance and improvement of rivers and harbors is less necessary than the maintenance of the other activities of the Government? Let us analyze this query briefly. The products of the country, both raw and manufactured, must be distributed. Our domestic needs and our exports require that these products should be moved between different sections of the country and to our terminal ports. This distribution is comprehended under the term "transportation." It is trite to say that we have three instrumentalities of transportation—the highways, the railways, and the waterways. The country has been awakened to the necessity of improvement of its highways. With Federal cooperation the States and the counties are active in the improvement of interstate or local highways. The motor truck has introduced a substantial aid for the movement of local traffic.

The railroads are confronted with inadequate terminals, with a deficiency of rolling stock, and with an enormous traffic. So far they have been unable to finance the purchase of rolling stock or to make the necessary additions to their tracks and terminals. Every intelligent citizen realizes that the country needs additional methods of transportation.

The waterways are the only remaining instrumentality to which the country can turn for relief. This fact is recognized by all men. Congress recognized this need at the present session in the enactment of the transportation act of 1920, by incorporating certain provisions intended to encourage water transportation. Certain essentials must exist for the more complete utilization of our interior waterways; primarily navigable channels must be provided and maintained, water terminals must be constructed by cities and towns, and there must be an economical and expeditious interchange of traffic between boat lines and the railroads. Such interchange must be predicated upon the same liberal terms and conditions as now prevail in the interchange of traffic between the different lines of railroad. The enlarged use of our interior waterways is absolutely essential to the welfare of the country.

Is it not, then, true that the maintenance and improvement of our waterways are just as important as the maintenance of any of the other activities of the Government? Was it not a serious dereliction of duty to neglect this essential activity? If in answer thereto it may be said that the majority did pass a river and harbor bill, may it not be said in reply that it was an inadequate bill; that it differed from all other appropriation bills in that it carried a lump-sum appropriation and was therefore grossly discriminatory and unfair?

I dislike to introduce the element of partisanship into the discussion of legislation for rivers and harbors. I have been a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for some years. With few exceptions, the committee have formulated river and harbor bills which were free from partisan bias or sectional spirit. The maintenance and improvement of waterways and harbors should be neither partisan nor sectional. Therefore I do respectfully protest against the attitude of the Republican majority in this Congress as exhibited during the recent session in making the river and harbor bill a partisan measure and by unfairly discriminating against this essential activity of the Federal Government.

Hawaiian Rehabilitation Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, May 22, 1920,

On the bill (H. R. 13500) to establish the Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the Hawaiian rehabilitation bill having passed the House, I feel that as ranking member of the Committee on Territories I may properly say a few words concerning the activities of the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE] in behalf of this measure. To secure a bill that would take care of the native population, save the lands to the people there, and at the same time not destroy the sugar industry there was not an easy task. The present measure will come as near suiting all of the people of Hawaii as any measure that can be written. No new land law will suit all of them. But the bulk of the people accept this measure, the landowners accept it, the chamber of commerce accepts it, and it spells prosperity and renewed activity for our choicest island possessions, as well as the rehabilitation of that wonderful race of people, the native Hawaiians. The Delegate is to be congratulated.

Rehabilitation of Persons Disabled in Industries.

OF

HON. STUART F. REED,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 16, 1919.

The House had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4438) to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this legislation which proposes national aid in cooperation with the States in helping those who are so unfortunate as to become permanently disabled in mining, railroading, farming, or other industrial pursuits.

The bill provides that the Federal Government shall pay half and the State that elects to cooperate in this work shall pay half. When the State agrees to appropriate $1,000 the Federal Government will add another thousand dollars to help to save industrial cripples from lives of hopelessness and dependence and fit them to engage in gainful and useful occupations. The amount proposed to be expended for this purpose the first year is $500,000, the second year $750,000, and the third year it reaches the limit of $1,000,000, and it will not be increased after that.

Members to-day are opposing this legislation because of the expense involved. Yet these same men have been voting billions of dollars for the destructive machinery of war. My colleagues, the money provided in this bill is for the splendid work of salvaging men. I favor it not only because it is right and noble and humane, but because it is a sound, economical business proposition. It means the taking of helpless human beings from poorhouses and sanitariums and making them self-supporting instead of remaining during the rest of their lives a burden to themselves, to society, or to their relatives. For every dollar spent in this kind of work it is safe to say that $10 will eventually be saved to the States and to the Nation.

But the opponents of the bill say we must economize, and this is the place to begin. Our honored and beloved ex-Speaker [Mr. CLARK] is greatly alarmed because Republicans have proposed such an extravagant measure as the one under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I took great pleasure in joining my colleagues recently in a work of real economy. We cut the Army and Navy appropriation bills down $250,000,000 below what the Secretary of War was demanding and all the appropriations about $1,500,000,000 below the estimates of the administration. I gladly join the advocates of economy wherever it is practicable, but I must part company with them when they proposed to begin on the crippled and unfortunate of this rich and generous Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with the economic value of a man. Those who oppose the measure say it is not a national problem. Well, it was a national problem when we called for the manhood of America to defend the old flag. The War Department did not ask the States for their inefficients and their cripples; the demand was for their physically fit youth, the best and the grandest of their manhood, and left the infirm, the aged, and the crippled to do the best they could to feed and equip that magnificent American Army that went overseas and carried our flag to victory. [Applause.]

My friends, it is an economic question. It is said by the Census Bureau that this morning 9,000 little, helpless pink bundles of babyhood opened their wondering eyes for the first time, newcomers to this Republic. A noted economist in one of our eastern colleges says that each one of these babies has an economic value to the State of $90. I do not know his method of reasoning, but he goes further and says that each infant that reaches the age of adolescence, or the threshold of manhood or womanhood, has an average economic value to our country of $4,000. A well-known educator recently stated that a man from the soles of his feet up to his neck is worth as a laborer from $2 to $6 a day. From his neck up he may be worth from $10,000 to $100,000 a year. In one of the New England States a corpse was taken from the medical department of a certain college, and the authorities reported that the school had suffered a loss of $100.

The evidence, therefore, is overwhelming as to the economic value of a human being while living, and the report of the medical school proves that even after life's fitful dream is over man's inanimate tenement of clay has a value ranging from $100 to $150. May I say in passing that we have some men in the country disloyal to our flag that might fittingly be utilized by the medical schools? That would seem to be about their only economic value to America. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there are many kinds of cripples in the United States. I notice in the committee's report the statement that some cripples will rehabilitate themselves. A few years ago a man with but one leg came into my office on crutches and asked if I would make a contribution to get him a cork leg. I asked him where he had lived heretofore. He told me. I dispatched a letter to a friend of mine there and asked for his history. He replied:

> That one-legged man has been collecting money to get a cork leg for at least 15 years, but he does not want one. He has been going from town to town for years, and the empty breeches leg and the appeal for a cork leg is the shibboleth of his prosperity, and always will be.

This man was the kind of cripple whom you could not rehabilitate. Even if it were possible for the scientist to construct for that man an artificial limb so true to nature that the heel could become afflicted with stone bruises and the toes be susceptible to real human corns, he could not be made to accept it, because he could use his infirmity and his need to induce the public to supply all his wants. [Laughter and applause.]

I recall another occasion when a well-dressed young man called on me and asked if he could interest me in office equipment. He looked every inch a prosperous business man, and said he had come to the city to place a bid for some filing cases for the county clerk's office. When he entered the room I observed that he limped slightly, but he carried only a slender walking stick. During our conversation I said, "You appear to be a little lame."

"Yes," he replied, "just a little on account of having lost one of my legs in an accident."

Then he arose and, swinging his cane above his head, he skipped gracefully around my desk. I expressed my admiration at his agility. He turned to me and said:

"Mr. REED, if you will promise to say nothing about it publicly, I will tell you the whole truth. Both of my legs have been amputated, but I am in your city competing with other firms for a contract at your courthouse, and I do not desire any advantage to accrue to me through sympathy for my infirmities. I want my case to stand purely on its merits. If one thing more than another disgusts me," he said, "it is a darned cripple running around using the sympathy stunt to earn a living."

Mr. Speaker, the two men to whom I have alluded represent the extremes of unfortunate humanity. One man did not want to be reconstructed and the other did not need it. One preferred the path of the mendicant and the tramp. The other man was the embodiment and incarnation of those God-given forces that triumph over misfortune and lead on to victory and achievement. [Applause.]

There are some unfortunate beings whom this law will not help, and there are others who do not need it. But between the two classes there is a national economic asset that we can not afford to ignore.

Mr. Speaker, it might prove interesting to unroll the scrolls of time and see how many great niches in the temple of history are occupied by men physically imperfect—men who succeeded in spite of handicaps and infirmities. Some came into this world with frail and deformed bodies, while others were injured by accident. It is said that Hannibal had but one eye, Cæsar had fits, Beethoven was deaf, Alexander the Great was deformed. Voltaire was a puny, bloodless creature, Milton was blind, Byron had club feet, and we hear that the Kaiser has a withered arm.

Some of these men made the world better and some of them made it mourn, but who will deny that every one of these defectives and cripples, whether his life counted for good or evil, put himself in human history and made the world acknowledge his power.

To-day there are thousands of men and women in our country who are practically helpless by reason of some bodily injury. It has been demonstrated that most of these can be trained and made efficient for some calling or occupation.

The critics of this legislation, in seeking for some plausible reasons to defeat its passage, say the work of rehabilitating the cripples of the land is one that should be encouraged, but let the States do it. They say it is not right for the Federal Government to enter the States and spend money and engage in this or similar undertakings. Why was not this argument advanced when we made an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the control and eradication of tuberculosis in domestic animals in the States? Where were the economists when we appropriated about half a million to control hog cholera in the States? How about the millions the National Government is spending in the States to improve rivers and harbors, to construct public roads, and protect standing timber?

Defeat this measure, gentlemen, and the policy of the great American Congress will be roads and highways projected, forests and cattle inspected, river channels deepened and deflected, black-leg calves injected, hogs protected, the rehabilitation of the children of men in glorious America neglected. [Applause.]

Federal Aid in Construction of Good Roads.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM D. McKEOWN,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, propaganda urging a change of the present method of Federal aid in the construction of good roads has made its appearance. It is proposed to establish a national highway system to be wholly constructed and maintained by the National Government. It is doubtful if such a change would ever be advisable, but it is certainly not expedient at this time in view of the condition of the Treasury. It is desirable to have a system of hard surface roads throughout the several States, and this result can be secured under the present system. Highway use is very largely a local matter. The growth and development of a community is greatly increased by the construction of permanent roads in or adjacent thereto. No system should be adopted that would benefit a few at the expense of the many.

For that reason the local communities should contribute their share of the expense of construction.

We are told by competent authority that freight can be transported cheaper on short hauls by motor trucks than by rail, but on long hauls the cost of transportation by truck is prohibitive.

The present plan of Federal aid for good roads is just getting into operation. The Shackleford Act was approved July 11, 1916, and many States were unable to act until their legislative bodies convened and enacted into law the necessary legislation and made the needed appropriations. This did not occur until the winter of 1916 or early spring of 1917.

In April, 1917, the declaration of a state of war was made and all road building almost ceased. All construction work was necessarily restricted by the concentration of all effort to bring the war to a successful and speedy conclusion. All bond issues that had been voted for road construction were held in abeyance and nothing was undertaken until after the signing of the armistice to resume the construction of highways. The war awakened the people to the necessity of permanent road building and demonstrated that it would be necessary in future construction to build roads that would withstand the heavy truck. Roads that were considered among the best before the war were ruined by the heavy trucks during the war.

One of the first things that confronts those who favor permanent roads is the greatly increased cost of labor and material. This fact has retarded many communities in completing their plans to commence or complete road construction. Notwithstanding this drawback, the public has supported a very large building program, as is evidenced by the bond issues voted during the year 1919.

The present system of Federal aid has not had a fair opportunity to demonstrate its merits. It began operation under abnormal conditions, which grew worse. Although we are trying to readjust our affairs since the ceasing of hostilities, yet the shortage of the supply of available railroad cars is threatening all business, but especially road building. The constant demand to allocate all open-top cars to the coal industry retards construction, and the present shortage is causing great financial loss to the contractors and municipalities engaged in road work.

The time may arrive when it will be necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to allocate all open-top cars to transport coal to keep the people of America warm. If it becomes necessary, then the commission should make the order, but I enter my solemn protest against any such order for the benefit of manufacturing plants alone. Men who have their all invested in road building and road-building materials during the war stood by the Government, although under the priority shipping rules their business was practically destroyed, while on the other hand many of the manufacturing plants now demanding the open-top cars to convey their fuel were making handsome profits out of war contracts.

Frequent requests from various persons and organizations interested in improved highways for information concerning the present law of Federal aid induces me to call attention to some of the requirements under the present law to obtain Federal aid.

The road to be improved must be a "rural post road," as defined in the law to be "any public road a major portion of which is now used, or can be used, or forms a connecting link not to exceed 10 miles in length of any road or roads now or hereafter used for the transportation of the United States mails, excluding every street and road in a place having a population, as shown by the latest available Federal census, of 2,500 or more, except that portion of any such street or road along which the houses average more than 200 feet apart."

The application for Federal aid must first be presented to and approved by the State highway department before being submitted by such State highway department to the Bureau of Roads for the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture.

To obtain the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture it is necessary that the proposed construction "be substantial in character." After his approval the State highway department must furnish to the Bureau of Roads "the surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates as required."

The share to be paid by the United States "shall not exceed 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof," and further provision is made that no payment of Federal aid funds shall be made on any project until the plans, specifications, and estimates have been approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The provision limiting the share of the United States to "50 per cent of the estimated cost thereof" should be so amended that in States like Oklahoma, where there are large areas of nontaxable lands, the share of the United States be increased in proportion as the nontaxable area bears to the taxable area of the whole State. If in a State the nontaxable lands are 20 per cent of the entire State, then the share of the United States should be increased 20 per cent. This would increase the share of the United States from 50 per cent to 60 per cent and reduce the share of the State from 50 per cent to 40 per cent.

This would not be unfair to the other States, as it would not increase the proportionment to the State.

There is a further limitation of the pro rata share of the United States to $20,000 per mile "exclusive of the cost of bridges more than 20 feet clear span" for labor and material which has been actually put into the said construction in conformity to the plans and specifications. Under the prevailing prices for labor and material I am of the opinion that the amount should be increased.

In view of the disposition of some to swindle the public in the value of labor and material used in the construction of a road-building project, it should be made a felony to make a false statement relative to the value of labor or material used for the purpose of defrauding the Government in constructing the road. I have introduced a bill to take care of such a situation. The public is entitled to a dollar in value for every dollar spent for good roads.

Under the present law the amount of Federal aid apportioned to Oklahoma for the years 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921 aggregates $6,838,245.60, and is not sufficient to take care of all the projects requiring Federal aid. What is true of Oklahoma is also true of other States.

The amount appropriated should be increased to meet the demands made upon the Bureau of Roads for aid.

The lack of sufficient appropriation is demoralizing the road-building spirit. Some communities have voted bond issues expecting to receive Federal aid, unaware that the State's apportionment has been exhausted.

The duty and responsibility rests upon the State highway department to distribute the sum allotted to the State for the construction of roads.

Sometimes communities complain of the amount of Federal aid awarded to them by the State highway department and oftentimes demand dollar for dollar out of the Federal aid fund for the entire amount of their project. It must be remembered that the amount apportioned to each State is limited and should be fairly distributed by the highway department.

The Bureau of Roads and the several State highway departments have had many perplexing problems to solve, and in the proper solution of the same have displayed splendid ability and efficiency. They are entitled to the help and encouragement of all those who desire permanent highways throughout the United States.

Before concluding my remarks I desire to express my appreciation for the efficient manner the present Chief of the Bureau of Roads, Mr. MacDonald, is conducting the bureau. He is a worthy successor of the late Director Logan Waller Page, whose life work was given to the study and building of good roads in America. His name should be perpetuated in some magnificent highway bearing the same.

Nothing will turn the tide of humanity from the cities back to the rural community more effectively than the construction of permanent highways. Nothing will encourage the production of food products more than good roads that can be traveled all the year.

Let us encourage the construction of good roads throughout the Republic and establish thereby a permanent foundation for the future prosperity and happiness of all the people.

OF

HON. HENRY D. FLOOD,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, May 17, 1920.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I can see no objection to incorporating these provisions in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill. Every Member of this House knows that we have had infinite trouble with people from our districts trying to get passports because the passport division with its limited force could not do the work that was expected of it in issuing passports. That is because Congress has not thought fit to make large enough appropriations to supply a sufficient force in the bureau. The conferees reached the conclusion that these gentlemen and ladies who desire to travel abroad should pay the expense of this passport provision. [Applause.] And if accidentally it will bring some revenue to the Treasury of the United States, we thought that was a good result. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that I suggested it originally, that I was the first one that suggested it, in order to help the bureau to charge a passport fee up to $5?

Mr. FLOOD. The first proposition I heard in regard to increasing passport fees came from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and his proposition was turned down by the Republican majority of that committee. The next suggestion came from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on the floor of this House, and the majority side raised the point of order against it. Like everything good the Republicans do, this suggestion came from Democratic sources. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On this side we thought it was right and fair that the people who had the money to travel abroad and demanded so much time of the passport division should pay for it, and I am glad the Senate agreed with the House Democrats, and the House conferees of the majority accepted in conference a proposition they had turned down in the committee and on this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe people who travel are willing to pay the $10 passport fee, and, whether they are willing or not, they should be made to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOOD. Just for a question. I have only a minute.

Mr. MASON. I am not at variance with you on that question, but on the other.

Mr. FLOOD. I am coming to that.

Mr. MASON. If you please.

Mr. FLOOD. I think when people go abroad protected by this Government, and liable by some action of theirs to involve this Government in trouble, we have a right to say that they must have a passport, and that they must pay to the Government a fee sufficient to cover the trouble and expense of issuing it. I am in favor of exacting passports from people who come into this country. I am proud that I am an American citizen, and I want to make it hard for people in foreign lands who do not appreciate our institutions and do not believe in our form of Government to come here and share with me my American citizenship. [Applause.] I am proud of the position that my country took in the Great War; proud of its great power, and proud of the way it exercised that power; proud of its Army and Navy, and proud of the glorious record that that Army made on the battle fields of France and Belgium, and proud of the achievements of the Navy [applause], and I am willing to put such obstacles in the way of foreigners coming here that it will make them take pride in this land and its glorious institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FLOOD. Yes.
Mr. GALLAGHER. Have we not already enacted restrictive legislation covering all the matters you are talking about?
Mr. FLOOD. We have restrictive legislation, and yet people come here who are dangerous to American institutions, and I am in favor of putting further restrictions around immigration to this country. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD F. McKINIRY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

Mr. McKINIRY. Mr. Speaker, in the November election of 1918 the people of this country elected a Republican Congress. We are now about to adjourn that Congress after an almost continuous session of one year.

It is needless for the present to analyze the reason for that decision of the people. The then existing Democratic administration was attacked and criticized by the Republican Party—voluble in promises of radical economic reforms if returned to power.

Particularly was a promise made to reform the tax and revenue laws and to reduce the high cost of living, even then a burden and now an intolerable imposition.

The voters showed that they were beguiled by these promises, that they believed these criticisms.

They in some large measure deserted the party which had performed its platform pledges, and had inaugurated the most beneficial economic, financial, and social legislation, and finally had managed and directed America's glorious part in the most stupendous war in history.

Out of the backwash of that bloody and gigantic struggle, which spread ruin and misery over the whole earth, no country escaped. Small comparatively were the evils of our own land and vast was the increase in our wealth and prosperity, saved as we were from inevitable financial panic and economic distress by the operation of a great Democratic reform—the Federal Reserve System. Yet those minor difficulties we did not escape gave the Republican Party its opportunity and it won. It has had a full, fair opportunity to demonstrate the good faith of its criticisms and promises.

And now the reckoning is at hand. Strange to say, so fixed was the habit of blaming existing conditions, really due to nature's own laws, on the Democratic administration, that for some time most people seemed unaware that the most powerful branch of our Government—the Congress—has been Republican for almost two years.

But now in every corner of this land they are beginning to ask the Republican Party the question, "What have you done?" For one solid year this Republican Congress has been in session and an accounting must be made. Both parties have been on trial and each must stand on its own record and not on criticisms of the other.

Two great problems faced the Sixty-sixth Congress—one the high cost of living, and the other the reform of the tax laws. What man is so stupid as not to realize that on both these problems nothing has been accomplished, because they are still with us, as far from solution as ever? All other national problems, such as relations between capital and labor, industrial prosperity and social betterment, the railroad situation, the stimulation of our merchant marine, all these were and still are important and serious; but the very vitals of our national life are affected by profiteering in the necessities of life and by onerous, discouraging, and intricate systems of taxation.

Both these great evils grew out of the enormous cost of the World War and the incident paralysis of normal trade and production.

It was the clear duty of any majority party in control of Congress to undertake manfully a comprehensive legislative program to remedy these evils. While it may be conceded that the high cost of living was a natural growth of war conditions, to be cured in the main by time and nature's laws, there is no such excuse for not simplifying our tax laws.

These laws were framed in an emergency and for an emergency; their imperfections came to the surface.

But being more eager for political advantage, the time and energy of the leading men of the majority of this House—and, by the way, over $2,000,000 of the people's money—were devoted, not to these great propositions but to digging up petty mistakes in war expenditures. Investigation committees have scurried about hunting for prey and scandal, and it is about time to attract public attention to the fact that none of these committees have reported back to Congress, where their reports would be tested for the truth.

I do not wish to predict, but if it should happen that in the coming political campaign accusations based on so-called facts found by these committees will be made, be it remembered that no opportunity for defense has been afforded on the floor of the House of Representatives.

The gallant fighting spirit of the American soldier, sailor, and marine carried our flag to victory; yet the guiding hand, the clear counsel, and patriotic impulse was that of the Democratic administration. Without that guiding hand and directing genius our colossal effort would have been a colossal failure. Slowly but surely the people of this country, generous minded and just at heart, have been taking a broad and fair view of that gigantic task.

They had been at times during and shortly after the Great War irritated and disgusted by the mistakes, by the arrogance, by the stupidity—yes, and by the criminality of a comparative few, hurriedly intrusted with temporary authority; but they know now and will continue to learn with greater certainty that the Democratic Party, through its great Democratic administration throughout the terrible stress, was sound at the core. The war was won. The cost was great; but the war was won. Mistakes were made; but the war was won. Some men failed in the crisis, for human nature is frail; but the war was won.

The great task of reconstruction came, and to these the Republican Party, now in power in House and Senate, should have addressed itself.

Instead it commenced a policy of faultfinding; it gave its greater energies to the undignified occupation described by the poet—

> Great fleas have little fleas
> Upon their backs to bite 'em;
> And little fleas have lesser fleas
> And so ad infinitum.

But the Republican Party did not forget its old policy of taking care of its political friends—the big business interests. They could not avoid tackling the railroad situation. The Cummins-Esch railroad bill will cost the people hundreds of millions in direct expenditures and hundreds of millions indirectly through increased railroad rates for the benefit of the great moneyed interests.

To reduce the high cost of living they offered the people cures by passing bills imposing a high tariff to increase the cost to the American consumer—on magnesite, on tungsten, on pearl buttons, on beans, on dyestuffs. "Make the cost of living higher" is the Republican answer.

They passed a bill to permit the formation of trusts and monopolies in foodstuffs, ostensibly for the benefit of the farmer, but in reality not; but no matter for whose benefit, it certainly was not for the benefit of the people.

No tax or revenue reform laws except a few trivial changes have been passed, although both political parties admit the need of such.

Not even the budget bill, a most essential financial measure, demanded by every class of citizenship, has been put in operation.

The universal demand for an American merchant marine has been used to foist on the country a bill giving to the Shipping Board the dangerous power of selling $2,000,000 worth of American shipping to foreigners and aliens. This bill has just been jammed through in the closing hours of the session, that great and real danger by a proper amendment, without the power to eliminate.

During the past year a great wave of sympathy for the Irish nation, struggling for freedom, has been spread over our land. Americans remembering the gallant aid offered ourselves in the hour of our need in 1776 by the Irish people, and remembering the devoted loyalty to our country of citizens of Irish blood, believed that we should in every way testify, as the mother of republics, our public concern and our active interest and encouragement to the Irish republic, just born and baptized with the blood of Irish patriots. It was hoped by the many who journeyed to attend the hearings in Washington on the bill known as the Mason bill that some congressional action would be taken; but that hope, deferred and wearied with waiting, has been in vain; no action has been taken. The answer to thousands of petitions is silence. Even now in the flying minutes there is yet time to heed those appeals.

And above all, no heed was paid to the country-wide demand for the repeal of the drastic and restrictive war-time legislation, essential during war time, but absolutely unnecessary once the country came back to a peace basis.

This Congress began its session on May 19, 1919, and despite the continued urgings of the Democratic Members, no action was taken by the Republican majority along these lines until in the very final week of the session, when, in answer to the challenge of a Democratic Member, Mr. CONNALLY, of Texas, a resolution was hurriedly jammed through under rules which prevented any necessary and proper amendment.

This resolution was a belated effort, made after a year of inaction, instead of a prompt and orderly repeal of war legislation.

These are only a few of the misdeeds the Republican Party, which now and for a year past has controlled Congress, must answer in defense of itself. The Republican Party must account.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS L. RUBEY,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, June 5, 1920.

THE AMERICAN FARMER MUST HAVE A BETTER PERSONAL-CREDIT SYSTEM.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, the United States are far behind most European countries in productive credit facilities for agriculture. The agriculture labor problem is a serious one, and in order to reduce farm production costs the farmer must utilize improved machinery wherever he can do so profitably. And that means more farm credit, better facilities through which he may capitalize his productive credit requirements. Another problem which is menacing us in the West is the cattle-raising problem. Within the past 10 days the cattle raisers of the West had a hearing before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, at which they voiced their protest against the calling of loans by the banks on "cattle-raising" paper. There are two sides to this question, the bankers' side and the cattle raisers' side. The governor of the Federal Reserve Board testified at that hearing that the Federal Reserve Banks of New York and Boston were at that time lending to the banks in the West. So the old cry of "wolf" does not apply in this case.

OUR BANKING SYSTEM DOES NOT MEET CATTLE RAISERS' REQUIREMENTS.

Let us meet this issue fairly and squarely. Deposit banking does not meet the needs of cattle raising. That is a credit which takes from 21 to 30 months to reproduce itself, and the deposit banker who ties up his borrowed money for that length of time will find he has "frozen assets," and he can not meet the demands of his creditors (depositors) with such assets. The deposit banker is the greatest demand-payable debtor in the business world, and in order to meet such obligations he must cover the same with liquid assets representing production. That is the last word in sound deposit banking. The deposit banker may disregard that law while labor is busy at a remunerative wage, and all are saving a portion of their income; but reverse such conditions, let labor be discontented and everybody go on a wild spending rampage, and we find it impossible for the deposit banker to meet the demands of his creditors and producers, too, however much he may hope to do so. Such is the condition which confronts us at the present time. No reasonable person would blame the owner of a fine thoroughbred for refusing to put such a horse to a dray and pull a load far beyond his capacity to draw simply because there was some one needing that class of work done. On the contrary, such an owner would be blamed for doing so foolish a thing. Now, the same principle applies to a credit institution. The deposit banker can not meet many of the necessary needs of agriculture, especially cattle raising, and he should not be blamed for his failure to do so.

SOLUTION OF CATTLE RAISERS' CREDIT PROBLEM.

Europe solved the credit problem now confronting the cattle raisers in this country. They solved it by adopting the oldest system of banking; that is, by creating the machinery through which their farmers could "bank with bills" of exchange. Three bills were introduced in this and the last Congresses which meet this situation. The one introduced in this Congress is H. R. 12678, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], and those of the Sixty-fifth Congress are H. R. 11695, introduced in this body by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Saunders, and S. 4646, introduced in the upper Chamber by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], while chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. The general principles of all three of those bills are almost identical. It was the purpose of each to adopt the ancient system of "banking with bills" for the farmers of this country.

ANCIENT SYSTEM OF "BANKING WITH BILLS" EXPLAINED.

Credit is a commodity, just like wheat, corn, and cotton are commodities. In order to sell any commodity you must have buyers as well as sellers. If I were to take a load of wheat to an inland city of Cuba, I could not dispose of it for what it was worth, as there would be no buyers there to deal with. Neither would there be an elevator in which to store it nor a mill to grind it. So, likewise, if a man should bring a load of seed cotton to my town, Lebanon, Mo., he would have to sell it at a great sacrifice, as there is no market there for cotton in the seed, and no cotton gin to put it in a merchantable condition. But let him take it to any town in the cotton belt during the season, and the moment he reached the courthouse square or principal street, he would find buyers to sell it to and gins to gin it. The same thing applies to credit, as I have said. If I sought to organize a deposit bank, all I would have to do would be to go to a community and select a few men of wealth who enjoyed the confidence of the prospective depositors in that community. That is an easy thing to do, as that is a local banking system. But if I sought to bank with written credit instruments, call them bills of exchange, grangers, short-time notes, promissory notes, or what not, in which I must inspire the confidence of strangers to me, and those who were to control the bank, it necessarily follows that I must adopt different methods of inspiring confidence in order to raise my borrowed or banking capital. But when I establish confidence on a national basis it naturally follows that my business is on a safer basis than if I enjoyed local confidence only. The three bills referred to propose to do that very thing—to establish national confidence in the credit paper of this farm credit system.

In short, these three bills provide for 1 central bank and 48 branches, 1 branch for each State, and any number of community associations. The whole system is controlled by responsible farmers in the interest of farm production. The community associations create the paper and send it to their respective branches, which in turn indorse the same and send it to the central bank to be placed on the open market to be sold to investors. The principal business of the branches located in strictly agricultural States would be with the farmer creators of that paper, while the branches of the States with such industrial and financial centers as New York, Boston, and Philadelphia would have most to do in supporting the market for such paper. The wage earner who had bought $500 of that paper six months ago might desire to build a home, and to enable him to do so he might wish to cash that paper. Let us suppose that such wage earner lived in Massachusetts. He would send it to the Massachusetts branch of the rural-credit society, located in Boston, which would discount it at a reasonable rate. Now, when the wage earners of Massachusetts learned that they could always obtain the cash on such paper at the Boston branch they would buy it in preference to depositing their surplus wages in their savings banks, especially so when they learn that the security behind it was better than the security behind their savings-bank deposits and every dollar of it represented production. Massachusetts has $1,026,000,000 of savings-bank deposits, on which their wage earners realize a very low rate of interest.

But the wage earner of Massachusetts can not and will not look to the individual farmer living 2,000 miles away in Missouri. He must look to the system through which that paper is created, and the system must be sound and appeal to his judgment. The first step toward inspiring the confidence of the investing classes is to have it established by a government in which the investors have a voice in the legislative body creating it, and that means the Federal Government. The next step is to have a proper investigation of the bill adopted by Congress. I believe that if any one of those three bills were enacted into law it would give us the best personal rural-credit system in the world. But my opinion would carry no weight among investors who never heard of me. No Member of Congress or monetary expert in this country enjoys the confidence of all classes of investors. It is necessary, therefore, to have an investigation on these bills which would inspire the confidence of the investors throughout the country, and that means a judicial investigation of them—an investigation giving all classes the right to select experts to appear before the committee and establish their respective contentions. The wage earners of New England have shown their confidence in the savings banks of that section by the vast sums deposited in them. There is an organization of those institutions, and if its president were given the privilege of selecting an expert to appear before the investigating committee and point out defects in the bills presented, the investors in the New England savings banks would have more confidence in the paper to be created by the rural credit than if those institutions enjoyed no such privileges before the committee.

BENEFITS TO BE DERIVED FROM A JUDICIAL INVESTIGATION OF BILLS.

The Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, at the recent session of Congress created a special rural credit investigating committee to hold hearings during the vacation. There is no need whatever for a committee to investigate the subject of cooperative rural credit, as Congress has already sent several of such bodies to Europe. The Congressional Library contains ample information on the subject, and no one needs a committee to study that or any other subject. But we do need a judicial investigation of bills on the subject; that is, a hearing at which the parties who would be benefited by such legislation should have the right to present bills to the committee and select an expert to establish their merits, and all interests which would be affected should have the right to appear and oppose the same. This method of a judicial investigation of bills on this subject is not a new subject to Congress, for more than six years ago some of the leading farm papers and several thousand farmers petitioned Congress for the same. I therefore urge the newly created rural credit investigating committee to adopt a resolution something similar to the following:

Resolved, That we shall conduct our hearings judicially on personal rural credit bills in the manner hereinafter set forth:

That any Member of Congress or any representative group of farmers or stock raisers, farmers' organization or stock raisers' association, or group of farm papers may prepare and present to the committee on or before September 1, 1920, a bill on such subject, but each of such groups shall select an expert to appear before the committee and establish the merits of the bill presented by his group, organization, or association and point out the defects of any other bill or bills under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the committee.

That at least one leading representative of every interest which would be affected by the bills so presented shall be notified of his privilege on or before October 15, 1920, to prepare and present to the committee a written defense pointing out the defect or defects in any or all the bills so presented, and show why they or neither of them should become a law, and to select an expert to appear before the committee for the purpose of establishing the truth of his defense.

That any Member of Congress presenting a bill to the committee shall not be required to select an expert to appear before the committee, but no action shall be taken by this committee on any such bill unless the Member of Congress presenting the same shall appear before the committee and establish the merits of the same and subject himself to the cross-examination of the experts and the members of this committee.

Many farmers' organizations, including the Missouri Farm Bureau Federation and the National Grange, have petitioned the newly created congressional committee for a judicial investigation of bills in a manner similar to the resolution which I claim the committee should adopt. More than five years ago—during the Sixty-third Congress—four resolutions were introduced in Congress for such a judicial investigation of bills. Eleven speeches were made on those resolutions, among which was the speech of the Hon. Edward W. Saunders, of Virginia, one of the ablest lawyers of this body at the time and who has recently been elevated to a position on the supreme bench of his State. In that speech Justice Saunders said:

JUSTICE SAUNDERS' PLEA FOR A JUDICIAL INVESTIGATION OF RURAL CREDIT BILLS.

The requests contained in these petitions are so fair and so just that I do not see how this body can afford to ignore them. They offer an appropriate solution for this vexed problem. I am in hearty accord with the principle therein announced, that the function of a congressional committee to investigate a purely scientific question like this is judicial, and not legislative, and being judicial in character its machinery should conform to that of other judicial bodies by providing that the interested parties may appear by expert representatives of their own selection before a tribunal of impartial Government officials, and establish the justice of their own contentions.

This method of investigation not only appeals to my judgment as being fair and sound, but I believe in it from a moral standpoint. I have bankers as well as farmers among my constituents, as have many other gentlemen on this floor. These bankers are now engaged in the sale of credit for a profit; they have considerable capital invested in that business; and the farmers claim that in most European countries productive credit is sold by farmers on the cooperative basis—not for a profit, but as an aid to agriculture—and where this credit is so sold interest rates are lower than among the farmers of this country and agriculture is on a more profitable basis than with us. Hence if we create a tribunal before which these two selfish interests may appear and present their respective contentions, we will not be charged with representing any special interest. I maintain therefore that every Member of this body should support these resolutions from a moral standpoint alone.

Section 2 of the Sheppard and Candler-Doolittle-Helgesen resolutions reads as follows:

"SEC. 2. That such subcommittee or investigating body, which is hereinafter referred to as the commission, shall hold its hearings and investigations in such manner that will permit persons who, in the commission's opinion, have sufficient authoritative backing to present bills for a personal rural-credit system in the United States to the commission and appear before them by experts of their own selection to establish the merits of their respective bills and to disprove any provisions contained in bills not presented by themselves. The commission shall notify at least one leading representative of every interest affected by such bills, including the president of the American Bankers' Association, of his privilege to appear before the commission by an expert of his own selection and to advocate or oppose any bill presented, who shall enjoy the same rights and privileges before the commission as the experts of the proponents."

Under that section one group of farmers may appear before that commission by an expert with a personal rural-credit bill embodying the German system; another group with a bill embodying the Belgium system; another the French system; and still another group may appear with a bill embodying a blend of all those systems. Each expert would be specially interested in establishing the merits of his particular proposition and pointing out the defects of the other bills, while the members of the commission would sit as a court to confine the experts to the issues and not permit them to ramble. Each expert would see to it that the evidence introduced by the other experts was authentic and relevant to the issues, and would seek to test the credibility of the witnesses introduced by the opposition. In addition to the farmers' experts, there would be the experts of the bankers and investing classes in the event they sought to avail themselves of the privilege extended by the resolutions. Should the experts of the latter class fail to come before the commission, this would in no wise reduce its power or hinder a full disposition of the subject matter.

In order to fully appreciate the force and effect of this method of investigating a scientific subject, it is well to consider the present prevailing practice in making such investigations. As a rule the chairman selects the witnesses to testify, and becomes their principal interrogator. He is allowed an appropriation so as to enable him to secure the aid and services of an expert, but no opposing view may be presented by an expert, with the right to cross-examine the witnesses introduced by the committee. This system does not admit of the fullest and most dispassionate investigation of a subject matter. Hence the request for such an investigating body as is provided for in the Sheppard resolutions.

One of the first acts of this Congress two years ago was to create a United States commission to study rural credits abroad. A Member of this House, Mr. Moss, and two Members of the Senate [Senators FLETCHER and GORE] were on that commission. They reported a land-mortgage bill, and said that they believed that personal rural credit could "best be enacted by the various State legislatures." Their land-mortgage bill was referred to subcommittees composed of members of the Banking and Currency Committees of the two bodies. After a long investigation they respectively reported bills. These two bills are as wide apart as the poles, and the members of the commission and the two subcommittees are at such loggerheads that it has been impossible for us to secure any legislation on land mortgages from this Congress. I believe the best solution of the land-mortgage subject would be to extend the scope of the Sheppard and Candler-Doolittle-Helgesen resolutions so as to embrace land-mortgage bills and require the authors of the above bills to appear before the proposed commission and submit their bills to the test provided under these resolutions. Another thing which may be said in favor of these resolutions is the small appropriation asked for—only $9,000.

When my constituents began to send me petitions praying Congress to create a special committee to hold hearings on this subject of rural credits, I saw at once from the number and character of the writers that they were much interested along this line. The farmers are not asking anything unreasonable in this matter. They are not asking anything that will be to the prejudice of business or of the commonweal. They are asking for an opportunity for the full development of a system of vital interest to them, and therefore of vital interest to the whole country. They purpose to play their hands upon the table and submit the personal rural-credit plan to the most searching investigation and the most remorseless inquiry. If the plan is unworkable and indefensible, it will break down when subjected to such an inquiry and investigation. But by all means afford the opportunity at least for inquiry into the merits of this plan by the establishment of the commission proposed in the resolution of the Senator from Texas.

No one has ever attempted to answer the convincing argument advanced in that speech of Justice Saunders. With such an investigation the farmers of this country could secure this legislation. And the farmers can secure the investigation by making a united demand on the committee for it, for it is so fair and just that no one can refuse such request.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. McKINLEY,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, May 16, 1920.

The House had under consideration the resolutions on the death of Hon. WILLIAM J. BROWNING, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. Speaker, in December, 1905, I was first sworn in as a Member of Congress by our deceased friend, WILLIAM J. BROWNING, who then was the Clerk of the House of Representatives. At that time our acquaintance started and later developed into an intimate friendship covering all the years I have been in Congress. Mr. BROWNING and I had a mutual friend in Congressman Harry Loudenslager, the former Representative of the Camden district, and up to the time of his death, secretary to the national Republican congressional committee. When I became connected with the committee in 1906 as treasurer, Mr. BROWNING had full charge of the committee headquarters and continued as the efficient manager of this work during the campaigns until after Mr. Loudenslager's death, when he took Mr. Loudenslager's place as a member of the executive committee. Mr. BROWNING, on account of his intelligence, ability, and willingness to do hard work, was a tower of strength in the congressional committee. He was a true and devoted friend and a stanch Republican. His sudden death leaves a vacancy which it will be hard to fill.
